RAYNAUD (THEOPHILUS), one of the moſt famous, as well as moſt learned Jeſuits of the 17th century, was born in Soſpello (a), in the Earldom of Nice; but having ſpent the greateſt part of his life in France, he has been conſidered as a Frenchman [A]. He enjoyed a very long life, which was traverſed with a great many misfortunes; nevertheleſs, he could never be prevailed upon to leave the ſociety [B], to enter into any other community, tho' very advantageous offers were made him on that condition. He was extremely laborious; and loſt but very little time, either at meals, or in converſing with female devotees [C]. His great delight was to write books, and to exerciſe himſelf in the duties of his character. He is Author of a prodigious number of books. Some of them were branded by the Inquiſition [D], a circumſtance that gave him the utmoſt pain. He diſcharged his wrath upon the Dominicans, in a work (b) wherein he collected a great number of particulars, extracted from their writings, which had never been cenſured, though they juſtly merited it. His conteſts with ſome Dominicans,

(a) Hence he is called Ceſpitellenſis, to denote the place of his birth.

(b) Entitled, De immunitate Cyriacorum à Cenſuris.

[A] He has been conſidered as a Frenchman.] Alegambe ſays expreſsly, that he was a frenchman, a native of Soſpello, Natione Gallus, patria Ceſpitellenſis (1). Theſe Latin words include what is called in ſchools contradictionem in adjecto; for Ceſpitellum or Soſpitellum is indiſputably in Italy. See Baudrand under theſe two words. Father Oldoini cenſured Alegambe for this error, and ranks our Theophilus among the writers born in Liguria. Soprani has alſo ranked him among them (2). They are more in the right than Sotuel, who expreſſes himſelf in doubtful terms, Natione Gallus, ſays he (3), an potius Italus? patria Ceſpitellenſis in Comitatu Niceenſi.

(1) Alegambe, Bibl. Script. Societ. Jeſu, p. 431.

(2) Oldoinus and Soprani publiſhed catalogues of that part of Italy.

(3) Natan. Sotuel, Bibl. Script. Societ. Jeſu, p. 757.

[B] His life . . . was traverſed with a great many misfortunes; nevertheleſs, he could never be prevailed upon to leave the ſociety.] Here follow Sotuel's words: Vocationis ſuæ religioſæ tenaciſſimus, quamvis & utilia & honorifica extra ſocietatem ei promitterentur à Primoribus, ſi hanc inter aſpera quæ ſubinde patiebatur, deſerere vellet, nunquam eos auſcultare voluit (4). i. e. " He adhered moſt ſtrictly to his religious voca" tion; though great advantages and honours were
" promiſed him, out of the ſociety, by perſons of " high quality, if he would leave the ſociety of the " Jeſuits, and the hardſhips he was from time to " time obliged to undergo in it; but he would never
" liſten to any ſuch propoſals." See below (5) the paſſage of Monconys, and one from a Janſeniſt (6).

(4) Idem, ibid. p. 758.

(5) In the rem. [L].

(6) In the rem. [K].

[C] He was extremely laborious; and loſt but very little time, either at meals, or in converſing with female devotees.] He was a very ſober man, and uſed to ſit only a quarter of an hour at meals; and when he, by reaſon of his very advanced age, might have converſed with women without the leaſt danger or ſuſpicion, he yet never liſtened to them except in caſes of neceſſity, and told in few words what he had to ſay. I only tranſlate Sotuel's word's on this occaſion. In victu valde abſtinens, ſays he (7), paucis & communibus ſemper uſus cibis, vix amplius uno quadrante dabat menſæ. Puritatis amator ſummus, mulierum colloquia cum erant neceſſaria, etiam ſenex, paucis verbis definiebat. He would have been very glad that all the reſt of the Clergy had imitated him in this particular, as he himſelf declares in his book de ſobria alterius ſexus frequentatione. But, generally ſpeaking, this morality is not agreeable to thoſe who have the direction of other people's conſciences; they are not much tired with the company of their devotees, if we may judge of this from the length of their converſations, and the frequent repetition of them.

(7) Sotuel, Bibl. Script. Societ. Jeſu, p. 757.

[D] Some of his books were branded by the Inquiſition.] He took ſo much pains to have the cenſure taken off, that he at laſt obtained leave to reprint them, upon condition of his correcting them (8). Theſe treatiſes are de Martyrio per peſtem, de Communione pro mortuis, & de Confixione Librorum (9). As all men have different ideas of things; it is no wonder that our Jeſuit took ſuch a diſgrace to heart; though other writers ſtand ſo little in fear of it, that they are ſometimes very glad to have their works put into the

(8) Poſtea ab auctore emendata, ab eadem ſacra congregatione anno 1659 recudi permiſſa ſunt & libere diſtrahi. Idem, ibid. p. 759.

(9) Idem, ibid.

index

nicans, and a great many other people, gave riſe to many injurious and bitter writings; for it cannot be denied, but that he was of a very ſharp and ſarcaſtical turn of mind, which the Jeſuits themſelves confeſs in ſome meaſure [E]. He died of an apoplexy (c) at Lyons the laſt day of October 1663. The Bibliographers of the ſociety of Jeſus are not agreed with regard to his age [F]; and therefore I ſhall not venture to aſſert, that he lived to ſeventy-nine years of age, as Gallois aſſerts, in a work which will furniſh me with ſome good paſſages with regard to this Jeſuit's genius [G]. Patin had a great eſteem for him [H]; and it appears that he was a little too much applauded by him, and [L].

(c) Ictus apoplexia migravit ad Dominum. Sotuel. Bibl. Script. Societ. Jeſu, p. 758. This does not agree with the paſſage of Monconys, cited below, rem. [L].

index, or diſpleaſe the inquiſitors. This is frequently a proof of the goodneſs of a book. See what an ingenious man (10) has lately related with reſpect to the cenſure of the Acta Sanctorum.

(10) L'Auteur des Lettres Hiſtoriq. for March 1696. p. 245.

[E] This the Jeſuits themſelves confeſs in ſome meaſure.] They ſay that he was of an impatient impetuous temper; and that he did not ſpare father Bollandus, of the ſame ſociety with himſelf and his good friend, though he had done him very ſignal ſervices; and who had incurred his anger, only for differing in opinion from him with regard to a Biſhop of Lyons. Had not Raynaud's paſſionate expreſſions been ſuppreſſed, the publick would have ſeen, in the ſecond edition of the Indiculus Sanctorum Lugdunenſium, that Bollandus was very ill treated. Father Papebroch revealed this little piece of ſecret hiſtory. Ita factus erat Theophilus, ſays he (11), ut neminem contradicentem ſibi patienter ferret, & niſi præſentes adfuiſſemus, cum prælo iterum pararetur Indiculus Sanctorum Lugdunenſium, noſque mature aliquis admonuiſſet, inveniretur ibi acriter perſtrictus P. Joannes Bollandus in S. Anemundo Lugdunenſi Epiſcopo, ſub regimine S. Bathildis occiſo, quia ad 26 Januarii eundem ſtatuerat cum S. Delfino contra Theophili ſententiam, cui alias Bollandus amiciſſimus erat, & in curanda operum ipſius impreſſione Antverpiæ meritus de illo optime.

(11) Papebroch. Elucidat. Hiſt. Actorum in Controv. Carmelit. cap. 7. in fine, p. 110.

[F] The Bibliographers of the ſociety of Jeſuits are not agreed with regard to his age.] Alegambe (12) ſays, that father Theophilus, when ſixteen years of age, entred into their order in 1602; but, according to father Sotuel (13), he entred it in 1592, at ſixteen years old. Since therefore he died in 1663, he lived, according to father Alegambe, ſeventy ſeven years; and, according to father Sotuel, fourſcore and ſeven. Now, in caſe he had lived fourſcore and ſeven years, this expreſſion of father Sotuel would not be juſt, Octogenario major . . . . migravit ad Dominum: this is proper only for people who died at a little above fourſcore years old. Gallois ſeems to me more worthy of credit than theſe two bibliographers, when he ſays (14), that father Theophilus lived to ſeventy nine years of age. It is ſtrange that the Jeſuits themſelves, who are appointed to write the elogiums of their writers, cannot tell how many years one of their moſt famous writers lived.

(12) Alegambe, Bibl. Script. Societ. Jeſu, p. 431.

(13) Sotuel, Bibl. Script. Societ. Jeſu, p. 757.

(14) Gallois, Journal des Savans, for March 14, 1667. p. m. 127.

[G] With regard to this Jeſuit's genius.] It would be impoſſible to ſpeak more particularly of the edition of all this author's works, than Abbé Gallois has done, in his Journal dated the 14th of March 1667. This edition comprehends XIX volumes in folio, and was publiſhed at Lyons in 1665. This ſkilful Journaliſt, having given the contents of each volume in few words, gives us the following judgment. It appears by this author's works, that he was bold and peremptory, had a lively imagination, and a prodigious memory. "Theſe advantages. which nature "had indulged him, joined to the indefatigable "pains with which he had applied himſelf to "ſtudy from almoſt his infancy, till the age of "ſeventy nine at which time he died, had made him "one of the moſt learned men of his age. But he "was of too biting and ſatyrical a turn, which had "drawn upon him the enmity of a great many per"ſons. His ſtyle, though otherwiſe very clear, "ſeems obſcure, becauſe he affects to make uſe of "difficult terms, and words taken from the Greek; "he ſometimes alſo has ſome pretty extraordinary "thoughts, as, where treating of our Lord's good"neſs, in one of the chapters of the ſecond volume, "he entitles it, Chriſtus bonus, bona, bonum. As "the vaſt compaſs of his erudition furniſhed him "with a numberleſs multitude of particulars on "all ſorts of ſubjects, he frequently deviates from "the ſubject he had propoſed to write upon; as, in "the treatiſe de roſa benedicta (the holy roſe) a conſiderable part of which he employs, in examining "the manner in which Lent was obſerved in the "primitive Church. It alſo may be obſerved, that "he did not give ſcope enough to his own genius; "he contenting himſelf with mentioning what he had "read in ancient authors; and often employing "their words to expreſs what he perhaps would "have done better in his own. Notwithſtanding "all this his works deſerve eſteem, and are extreme"ly uſeful to ſuch perſons as apply themſelves to "divnity and preaching (15)." Here follows what he ſays in particular with regard to the XV and XVI volumes, entitled Heteroclita ſpiritualia. "This author "treats therein of ſeveral doubtful cuſtoms, which, "either an exceſs of zeal, or remiſſneſs have intro"duced into the worſhip of God and the Saints, into "the good works that are performed to give eaſe "to ſouls in purgatory, into the uſe of the Sacra"ment, and into all other ſpiritual exerciſes. He "examines all thoſe doubtful acts of devotions with "great ſeverity: he condemns ſome, defends others, "and enforces his judgment with a greater number "of learned remarks, extracted from Church hiſtory "and the fathers. It was in treating ſuch matters "as theſe that he ſhone moſt conſpicuouſly; for "being of a ſatyrical, biting caſt of mind, he never "wrote to more advantage than when he was to "criticize and reprove (16)." Here follows what the Abbot ſays, with reſpect to ſuch pieces as were not inſerted in the nineteen volumes. They were not inſerted in this body or collection for a particular reaſon. The editors did not inſert in them the apologies againſt Hurtado, entitled Depilationes, becauſe this Frier is of an order called in Italy Peloſi. This collection does not contain the book, in which he treats whether a man may confeſs his ſins by way of letter; nor that entitled Hipparchus, in which he examines whether it is lawful for a Monk to concern himſelf with traffic. There alſo is omited in it the treatiſe De Immunitate Cyriacorum à cenſuris, a work levelled againſt the Dominicans; nor that entitled Religio Beſtiarum, wherein the predeſtination of the Thomiſts is refuted, nor another againſt father Combefis. Some other treatiſes of this author are wanting in the collection in queſtion, and theſe are eaſily diſtinguiſhed by the catalogue of his works which he printed ſeveral times. He deſigned to print all theſe pieces in one volume, and entitled Apopompæus, the name the Jews uſed to give to the Victim which they loaded with curſes, and abandoned in the deſert; but he was prevented from his deſigns by death (17). I muſt obſerve that father Sotuel takes notice, that the 20th volume, entitled Apopompæus, was actually printed after the author's death (18).

(15) Gallois, ib.

(16) Gallois, ib. p. m. 122, 123.

(17) Gallois, Journal des Savans, for March 14, 1667. p. 124, 125.

(18) Tomum 20, quem Apopompæum vocant, ediderunt alii poſt obitum Theophili, ſine approbatione ſuperiorum Societatis, unde hæc illum tanquam partum legitimum non agnoſcit. Sotuel, Bibl. Script. Soc. Jeſu, p. 759. I have a copy of that Apopompæus, the title of which runs thus: Tomus vigeſimus & poſthumus per Anonimum digeſtus, nunc primum in lucem prodiit Cracoviæ ſumptibus Annibalis Sangeyski bibliopolæ 1669.

Here follows a word or two more from Abbe Gallois (19). The moſt remarkable particular in the VIIth volume, entitled Marialia (20), is, the ſecond treatiſe written in defenſe of the devotion of the Scapulary; and the fifth, which, ſufficiently ſhews the great learning of this author, and the fruitfulneſs of his wit and genius. For being to preach on the ſeven ſolemn anthems which the Church ſings before Chriſtmas, and which begin by an O, he made this letter only the ſubject of his ſermons; and tho' ſo very barren a one, he yet ſtruck out a numberleſs multitude of beautiful particulars which form this treatiſe.

(19) Gallois, Journal des Savans, for March 14, 1667. p. 118, 119.

[H] Patin had a great eſteem for him.] "Martin "Schoockius, who alſo wrote a great number of "books . . . is as learned as the ancient Sophiſts "who diſputed and wrote on all things that can be "known. He, and Conringius, in Germany, are, "in this ſort of knowledge and compoſition, the "moſt learned men in Europe. But father Theo"philus Raynaud ſurpaſſed them both. He was a "Jeſuit, and was perfectly well acquainted with the "Romiſh and Jeſuitical Divinity; but had it not "been for this, and the reſpect he paid his ſupe-

(20) Becauſe all the treatiſes included in it, relate to the perſecutions or worſhip of the Virgin. ibid. p. 118.

and has not been juſtly cenſured with reſpect to his ſtyle [I], he not imitating Juſtus Lipſius, not hunting after old words, nor taking a pleaſure in reviving certain obſolete, worn-

" riors, he might have given a looſe, and then he " might have done more than three others, in all " kinds of literature ; for, abſtracted from his learn- " ing, and his wonderful memory, he gave ſuch a " perfection to all his works, as none but a great " maſter could bring them to (21)." Here follows another paſſage. If ever you ſee father Theophile, be ſo good as to preſent my ſervice to him ; and aſk him when we are to ſee his anſwer to a book printed againſt him in Amſterdam, in 8vo, and entitled, Antidotus duplex contra duplex venenum, &c. 8. Hiſpali, 1657. The printer has concealed, or diſguiſed the name of the town, it being printed in Holland, and not at Seville. I ſent him a copy of it, for which he returned me thanks, and told me that he would ſoon anſwer it. I have ſeveral letters of that worthy father ; and one of his friends, which I am not a little proud of, he being a very learned man in genere multiplici. I wiſh he would print a great number of MSS, he has by him. There is a great deal of learning in all his books (22). Theſe applauſes are the more conſiderable, as they are beſtowed by a man who was more apt to cenſure than praiſe ; and did not ſcruple to take notice of the defects, which he ſuppoſed he found in the works of that Jeſuit. Here follows another paſſage from him. The author of Sanctus Georgius Cappadox is an extraordinary, ſingular, and very learned man, except that he makes himſelf a Fiſhmonger on Eaſter-eve, and affects to write in ſuch a manner as is grown out of uſe, and nevertheleſs all his books are valuable, eſt enim vir multi-jugæ eruditionis ac infinitæ lectionis, (he is a man of prodigious erudition and endleſs reading) as Grotius uſed to ſay of the late Salmaſius. Father Theophilus Raynaud's ſtyle, redolet Lipſianum, quo tamen eſt multò deterior ; (his ſtyle is very much like that of Lipſius, but much worſe) ; there is not one author now who writes after this manner, if we except Mr. Blondel the Dean of our faculty, who, though one of the moſt learned men in the world, affects that kind of barbariſm, & eadem ſcabie laborat cum Tertulliano, Lipſianus ſeu Lipſiomimus vel Lipſio minus, qualis aliquando fuit Erycius Puteanus, Petrus Gruterus, Theophylus Raynaudus, & pauci alii quos fama obſcura recondit (23). i. e. " and has the ſame defect with " Tertullian. He is Lipſius's ape, as formerly was " Erycius Puteanus, Peter Gruterus, Theophylus Ray- " naud, and ſome few others, who now are no more " talked of." I will confeſs that I know not on what foundation this Jeſuit is charged by Patin with affecting an obſcure, broken and abrupt ſtyle, filled with what is called Archaiſms, or an obſolete diction. I have read ſeveral of his books, and find a different ſtyle that takes its ſcope, and is not laid under any conſtraint by interruptions or ſuſpenſions, and ſuch like faults of Lipſius's imitators. Farther Raynaud's ſtyle, indeed, is not polite ; but if it be rude and barbarous, it is not from an affectation of antiquated Latin phraſes, of the Latin which abounds with phraſes of Plautus, or Greciſms (24), which ſome literati are ſo fond of ; it is rather by his interweaving a great number of terms borrowed from the ſchoolmen. I even obſerve that he cenſured one of his adverſaries for employing ſome Greek words ; upon which Raynaud was anſwered, that it did not become him to ſpeak about Greek, ſince he was ignorant of that tongue. Mira hominis Buccafœtidi audacia, cæcus cum ſit, vult de coloribus judicare, & cum prorſus idiota ſit Græci idiomatis, judicare de vocibus Græcis . . . . quid vis apparere ſerularius Mag. in utraque lingua ? etſi enim Latinam bene calleas, at Græcam prorſus ignoras (25). i. e. " This man's au- " dacioufneſs is ſurprizing, who, though he be blind, " does yet pretend to judge of colours ; and, at the " ſame time that he is quite unſkilled in the Greek " tongue, yet pretends to criticize Greek words . . . " Why ſhould you offer to paſs for a maſter of both " languages ? for though you are a very good La- " tiniſt, you are totally ignorant of the Greek." His opponent acknowledges that he underſtands Latin very well ; but this circumſtance is of no great weight (26), as this teſtimony is given by a perſon who himſelf uſed to make ſoleciſms in every page (27) ; who can hardly write three lines but he makes the moſt abominable barbariſms, and is ever claſhing with the laws of Grammar. Barbararum lexeon, & ſolœciſmorum tanta ubertas eſt in Hurtadi opere, ut ſi tenui diligentia adhibita, notare Grammaticas ejus ſtribiligines liberet, totum pene ejus volumen eſſet exſcribendum. Vix tres lineas exarat, quin ſolœciſmis adeo pinguibus contaminet, ut miſerationem moveat (28). Thomas Hurtado . . . vix unquam emiſit periodum, qui non ſordeat ſtribiligine aliqua grammatica, & indigna colaphizatione Priſciani. Four examples of this are quoted in the ſame page : Deus expaveſcit nos (29) : opus bene executum : agendum eſſe de tactis (30). At the end of the book (31) was a particular liſt of the boxes of the ear he had given to Priſcian, if I may be allowed to employ this Jeſuit's figure. Raynaud's antagoniſt endeavours to apologize for himſelf in manner following, I only imitate the fathers (32) in that particular, many of whoſe phraſes are not juſt : Nonne in multis patribus inveniuntur ſimiles non ita vigoroſæ in latinitate locutiones ? And he ſays (33) that John Buſæus drew up a table of above 250 barbariſms of Petrus Bloſenſis.

[I] It appears that he was a little too much applauded by Patin, and has not been juſtly cenſured with reſpect to his ſtyle.] " Theophilus Raynaud gave all his " works ſuch a caſt of perfection, as none but a " great maſter could have done. This judgment, " which is of Guy Patin, is not exactly true. The " caſt of perfection, which great maſters only are " capable of giving, ſuch as Petavius and Father " Sirmond, was wanting in Theophilus Raynaud. " His plans were whimſical and odd, his erudition " without choice ; and his ſtyle, though good in " itſelf, vitiated in many places by childiſh affecta- " tions ; not to mention that the Author was unpo- " liſhed, and wholly void of urbanity (34)."

The reader has already ſeen (35) in what manner Patin's judgment with regard to this Author's ſtyle was refuted ; but I have ſomething to ſay on that ſubject. Theophilus Raynaud obſerves, that very few perſons have objected to his ſtyle, as rough. The only cenſor he mentions is one Camerarius * who cenſures him as writing in a rough, inflated ſtyle, interſperſed with barbarous terms ; and to have followed Petronius and Apuleius, rather than the Ciceronians. Non defuit, qui mei ſtyli ſqualorem opponeret. Arguebat ſanè Gulielmus Camerarius præfatione ad ſuam (ut inſcripſit) Antiquitatis de novitate victoriam, quod ſtylus ſcriptionum mearum ſcaber eſſet ac tumens : quod voces paſſim barbaras, & à nitore & lenitate Tullij alienas adhiberem : Et quod Petronio potius ac Apulejo, tumidis & inflatis ſcriptoribus, quam probatæ Latinitatis, ſtylique puri ac nativi Magiſtris, inter ſcribendum inhæſerim (36). I ſhall not copy what he relates in his own juſtification ; but will content myſelf with mentioning the work which he wrote in his own defence. Diſſertatio hujus & aliarum Camerarij calumniarum depulſoria, edita eſt hoc titulo, Non cauſa ut cauſa, ſubjuncta vera cauſa ; Elenchus ſophiſmatis Gulielmi Camerarij Scoti (37). Ea lucubratione à pag. 16. quam ridicula ſit hæc criminatio, & quam abſurdum ſit voces è Nizolij Ciceroniana pinacotheca anxiè ſublegere, in Didacticis præſertim ſcriptionibus, (cujuſmodi ferè ſunt omnes noſtræ, eaque nominatim, adverſus quam Camerarij æſtus inferbuit) plenè & accuratè demonſtratur. I add that, in the ſame place whence I have extracted this paſſage, he continues to refute this Critique. He defends himſelf chiefly from the citations of ſeveral Fathers of the Church, who were careleſs as to the beauty of their ſtyle. He ſays (38) that St. Auſtin was very negligent on that head ; and refers us to Bernard Vindicus's Prolegomena ad Criticum Auguſtinianum caſtigatum, in which is a chapter that treats of the barbariſms and ſoleciſms found in St. Auſtin's writings. After all, he does not own that Camerarius's criticiſms are juſtly grounded : he leaves the judgment of this to unprejudiced readers. Videor vaniſſimam & ineptiſſimam criminationem obtriviſſe multo pluribus quam neceſſitas poſtulabat. An verò Stylus ſcriptionum mearum, adeò vel jaceat, vel horreat, quam ſibi fingit

(21) Guy Patin, Letter 328. p. 663, Tom. 2.

(22) Ibid. Letter 209. p. 230, of the ſame volume. See alſo the 245th Letter, p. 372, of the ſame volume.

(23) Ibid. 173. p. 65 of the ſame volume.

(24) Gallois, citat. (15), charges him with affecting to employ words borrowed from the Greek.

(25) Thomas Hurtado, in duplic Antidoto, p. 453.

(26) See Hurtado, ibid. p. 10.

(27) Leodegar Quintinus, apud Hurtado, Antid. p. 437.

(28) Idem, apud eumdem, p. 10.

(29) Meaning, makes us afraid.

(30) Meaning, of the touch.

(31) See Hurtado, in duplici Antidoto, p. 437.

(32) Ibid. p. 439.

(33) Ibid.

(34) Vigneul Marville, Melanges d'Hiſt. Tom. 2. p. 303. Rotterdam edit. 1700.

(35) In the foregoing remark.

* This Camerarius was a Scotchman, and named William Camerarius, Prieſt of the Oratory in France.] From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 979. col. 1. N. B. There is an error in this note of the Paris edition of Bayle's Dict. it referring to the rem. [I], inſtead of the rem. [H], of the art. of RAYNAUD.] Rem. by the Tranſl.

(36) Theoph. Raynaud. Syntagm. de Libris propriis, p. 6. Apopompæi, col. 2.

(37) Idem, ibid.

(38) Idem, ibid. p. 8. col. 2.

worn-out phraſes; faults of certain Authors, for which they have been juſtly cenſured by fingit Camerarius cujus fuit hæc criminatio, pronuncient alij, affectu quo ille ducebatur liberi (39). I make uſe of the ſame method to defend myſelf againſt thoſe who ſhould imagine that I cenſured Patin unjuſtly. I appeal to all ſuch of my readers as are duly qualified, and ſhall peruſe, without prejudice, the writings of the Jeſuit: let theſe dip into different parts of his works, and read ſome pages here and there, and then I am ſure they will not ſay he has imitated Lipſius; but own that he may be put in parallel with Peter Gruterus, and Erycius Puteanus, as Patin affirms. I am indeed perſuaded, that they will not look upon his ſtyle as pure, ſmooth, and agreeable; but then they will not ſay that it is conciſe, rugged, filled with dark ellipſes, and obſolete forms, or affected. Any reader well ſkilled in the art of criticiſm may perceive that the Author in queſtion wrote with great rapidity; that he concerned himſelf very little with reſpect to the beauty of diction; that he did not correct his compoſitions; and conſequently that his words and his printed phraſes may be conſidered as a faithful copy of his rough copy; and that the firſt ſtrokes or effuſion of his pen were the firſt effuſions of his genius; and therefore that the bad Latin we meet with in his works, whether it be too obſolete or too modern, ought to be conſidered, not as affectation or artifice, but the native product of his genius. He was poſſeſſed of a vaſt memory; had read the claſſics in his youth; afterwards applied himſelf more aſſiduouſly to the Eccleſiaſtical Writers, the Philoſophers, and modern Divines. His memory which, as I ſaid, was vaſtly happy, was filled with phraſes of all that ſort of Authors, and readily ſuggeſted themſelves whenever he took up the pen; by which means he was able, without having recourſe to meditation, to call up at one time an expreſſion of Plautus, Lucretius, Petronius, Aulus Gellius, Apuleius or Macrobius; at another time an expreſſion from Tertullian, Arnobius, St. Hilary, or Sidonius Apollinaris; or laſtly, ſome phraſe of St. Bernard, the Commentators on Lombard, or of the angelical Doctor, &c. but the uſual and moſt common terms preſented themſelves oftenest, and he took that which firſt preſented itſelf; and conſequently his ſtyle is not affected; the mixture of old words and barbarous expreſſions introduced themſelves naturally in his writings, but did not take much place in them; and the Author did not take the pains to poliſh his ſtyle, nor make the leaſt corrections when we read his manuſcript over. In caſe I ſhould be miſtaken in this particular, ſtill the main part of my criticiſm would be indiſputable, in which Patin is concerned; no Authors having ever been more different, with regard to ſtyle, than Theophilus Raynaud and Juſtus Lipſius. The latter affected to end his periods at every line; and uſed to ſuppreſs ſeveral words, which obliged his readers to gueſs very often, and ſupply words. The Jeſuit is rather verboſe than laconic, and no ways obſcure for want of words, all his periods being long and full.

(39) Idem, ibid. p. 10. col. 1.

CENSURE of ſuch Writers as affect to employ obſolete words.

The compariſon between him and Gruterus is ſtill more unjuſt, for Gruter was not an Author, from whom obſolete words dropped now and then; he crowding them one upon another with a moſt ridiculous affectation; and took as much pains to get together this old rubbiſh, as Bembus and Manutius did to write politely. It is not eaſy to ſay, whether ſuch an affectation betrays more vanity or ill taſte; but it is certain that ſuch as affect this kind of ſtyle, are ſo ſilly as to imagine, that it will give their readers a high idea of their erudition; and the neceſſity they will be under of conſulting a dictionary perpetually, to ſearch for their meaning, will gain them admiration. This wrong turn of thinking has always been condemned by perſons of ſenſe. Favorinus ſneered in an admirable manner at a young man who was mighty found of obſolete words. If you do not care to be underſtood, ſays he, why do not you have recourſe to ſilence, which will be an infallible expedient? And if you are fond of antiquity, be contented with living as our anceſtors did, but I beſeech you to ſpeak as the moderns do at this time. Favorinus philoſophus adoleſcenti veterum verborum cupidiſſimo, & pleraſque voces nimis priſcas & ignotiſſimas in quotidianis communibuſque ſermonibus expromenti, Curius, inquit, & Fabricius, & Coruncanius antiquiſſimi viri noſtri, & his antiquiores Horatii illi trigemini, planè ac dilucidè cum ſuis fabulati ſunt: neque Aurunconum, aut Sicanorum, aut Pelaſgorum, qui primi incoluiſſe Italiam dicuntur, ſed ætatis ſuæ verbis locuti ſunt: tu autem, proinde quaſi cum matre Evandri nunc loquare, ſermone abhinc multis annis jam deſito uteris, quod ſcire atque intelligere neminem vis, quæ dicas. Nonne, homo inepte, ut quod vis abunde conſequaris, taceres? ſed antiquitatem tibi placere ais, quòd honeſta & bona & ſobria & modeſta ſit: vive ergo moribus præteritis; loquere verbis præſentibus (40). i. e. "The Philoſopher Favorinus perceiving a young "man to be extremely fond of employing, in com- "mon converſation, obſolete words, and ſuch as are "not known, ſpoke thus to him; Curius, ſays he, and "Fabricius, and Coruncanius, thoſe very ancient "Romans, and the three Horatii who were prior to "them, uſed to converſe with thoſe of the ſame age "with themſelves, in clear and plain language. "They did not employ the words uſed by the Au- "runci, the Sicani, or the Pelaſgi, who are related "to have been the firſt inhabitants of Italy, but "ſpoke the language of their contemporaries. But "you, as though you were converſing with the mo- "ther of Evander, ſpeak in a tongue that has been "diſuſed many years, becauſe you are not willing "that others ſhould underſtand you. Silly creature; "would it not be better for you to be ſilent, ſince "you will thereby gain your ends the ſooner? But "to this you ſay, that you are delighted with anti- "quity, becauſe the Ancients were honeſt, good, "ſober, and modeſt: live therefore after the manner "of the ancients, but ſpeak like your contemporaries." He concludes with referring him to a precept of Julius Cæſar, which was to ſhun old words as he would a rock (41). The Emperor Auguſtus was pretty nearly of the ſame opinion; he not pardoning Tiberius for affecting to uſe old words (42); and he called Mark Anthony a madman, for affecting alſo to be admired rather than underſtood (43). Aulus Gellius relates that a lawyer of his time uſed to be hiſſed, becauſe of his employing unintelligible words (44). There aroſe in the 16th century a certain faction of antiquaries with regard to grammar, who were ſtrongly oppoſed by the moſt ingenious and moſt learned men, to prevent its increaſing and corrupting the Latin tongue. Paſſerat made a ſpeech profeſſedly againſt this faction. Exorti ſunt, ſays he (45), his annis viginti proximis, non diſſimili laborantes inſania, novi quidam Antonii, utinam minus multi, quorum cauſſa, ne quid diſſimilem, hanc præfatiunculam inſtitui. Si quidem me facturum operæ pretium putavi, ſi iſtum animi morbum vel arte aliqua perſanarem, quod in iis difficillimum eſt, qui ſic ægrotare malunt quàm valere, vel aliqua ex parte imminuerem: idque ſaltem aſſequerer ne hæc apud noſtros latius ſerpat contagio. i. e. "There have "aroſe, within theſe twenty years, ſome new Anto- "nius's, who are fired with the like madneſs, (would "to God they had been fewer in number) for whoſe "ſake, to ſpeak the plain truth, I drew up this ſhort "Preface, to cure the diſtemper of the mind, which "it muſt be extremely difficult to do in perſons who "chooſe to be ſick rather than well; or I would "leſſen it in any manner; this I would do to pre- "vent that infection from ſpreading any farther a- "mong us." He ſays a little after, that the perſons he endeavoured to cure found nothing too antiquated for them; and ſought for words of a much older date than the verſes of the Salii. Sordent nobis Tullius, Cæſar, Terentius: Valerii Antiatis, Cincii, Cælii, Piſonis, Fabii Pictoris, Quadrigarii, Siſennæ annales requirimus. Unde tam delicatum faſtidium. Cato, & Varro, vix ad ſtomachum faciunt: vix aviditatem noſtram explent primi Conſulum faſces, & faſtorum incunabula: Decemvirales tabulas, leges regias, Saliare carmen, icta cum Sabinis fœdera, Fecialium jura formulaſque tranſcendimus, ut penetremus in ſermonem Aboriginum, tanquam ſimus cum Egeria Numæ, aut cum Evandri Carmenta loquuturi (46). i. e. "Tully, Cæſar, "Terence, are contemned by us; and we aſk for "the annals of Valerius Antius, Cincius, Cælius, "Piſo, Fabius Pictor, Quadrigarius, and Siſenna. "Whence

(40) Aul. Gellius, lib. 1. cap. 10.

(41) Id quod à C. Cæſare excellentis ingenii ac prudentiæ viro, in primo de Analogia libro, ſcriptum eſt, habe ſemper in memoria atque in pectore, ut tanquam ſcopulum, ſic fugias inſolens verbum. Idem, ibid.

(42) Sueton, in Auguſto, cap. 86.

(43) Et quidem Antonium ut inſanum increpat; quaſi ea ſcribentem quæ imitentur potius homines quam intelligant. Idem, ibid.

(44) Aul. Gell. lib. 11. cap. 7.

(45) Paſſerat. Præf. in Ciceron. Epiſt. ad Hirtium & Cæſarem, p. m. 171.

(46) Idem, ibid. p. 175.

(d) In the rem. [I].

by persons of taste. I give proofs of this (d). He wrote with great severity against the Jansenists, by whom he also was not spared [K]. His enemies spread strange reports concerning

" Whence this squeamishness? Cato and Varro are " scarce palatable to us; the ages of the first Con- " suls, and the infancy of the Roman Calendar, " scarce satisfy our cravings. We go more backward " than the tables of the Decemviri, the laws of the " Romish Kings, the verses of the Salii, the leagues " concluded with the Sabines, and the laws and for- " mularies of the Heralds; that we may penetrate as " far as the language of the Aborigines, as though " we were to converse with Numa's Egeria, or Evan- " der's Carmenta." Persons of this turn would willingly, in correcting their compositions, have blotted out a Ciceronian phrase, could they have substituted a phrase of Pacavius, or found in

Versibu' quos olim Faunus vatesque canebant,
Cum neque Musarum scopulos quisquam superarat,
Nec dicti studiosus erat (47).

(47) Ennius, apud Ciceronem de Oratore, folio 125, D; and in Bruto, folio 103, C.

" Such verses as old Bards and Faunus sung,
" When yet the muses heights were unexplored,
" And words not sought for to adorn the verse."

They desired to be called mortuaria glossaria (48). Horace had complained before of the like disease.

(48) Mera estis, ut M. Cato ait, mortuaria glossaria. Nam qui colligitis lenidia, res tætras & inanes & frivolas, tanquam mulierum voces præficarum. Aulus Gell. lib. 18. cap. 7.

Sic fautor veterum, ut tabulas peccare vetantes,
Quas bis quinque viri sanxerunt: fœdera regum
Vel Gabiis, vel cum rigidis æquata Sabinis:
Pontificum libros: annosa volumina vatum,
Dictitet Albano Musas in monte locutas (49).

(49) Horat. Ep. 1. lib. 2.

" Thus old-loves do admire the ancient laws,
" The Sabines leagues have their deserv'd applause;
" On musty leagues at awful distance look,
" Age makes it reverend and exalts the book;
" Give him the Bards old songs, oh rare! divine!
" I swear 'tis good, a muse sung ev'ry line.
CREECH.

I observe this to shew, that the same depraved taste arises from time to time. Passerat was not the only Author who exclaimed against these false antiquaries: we took notice above (50), of a satyrical piece in which they were ridiculed; and they are condemned in the due form in Father Caussin's rhetoric (51). I could name several more of the Literati (52), who could not bear the wild passion for old words, and who revived the complaints made against Sallust. If they did spare that ancient Historian, how angry must they be with the moderns? Quid, quod è quibusdam Sallustianis verbis tanta solicitudine inter prisci sermonis maceriem & ruinas conquisitis, & in illa ipsa tam laudata compositione nonnulla prolatu & intellectu sunt nova, quædam putidiuscula & pumicata, quædam ita scrupea, ut in ea vox impingat se tanquam in saxeu fragmina vetustatis (53). i. e. " What shall we say of " this, even that in the famous performance of Sal- " lust, amidst the words which were so industriously " sought for from among the rubbish of the old tongue; " some of these are new with regard to their pro- " nunciation and sense; some too affected and " smooth; and some so harsh and rugged, that the " voice strikes against them, as though they were so " many rocky fragments of antiquity." These are the words of every polite Writer. He had before observed, that a Writer ought not to introduce obsolete words into his compositions (54): Pertimescunt (verba humilis dicendi generis) sociari verbis rubiginosis, spinosis, nimium reconditis & abstrusis, tum intermortuis & conclamatis:

(50) Rem. [F] of the art. ACCURSIUS (Mari-Angelas).

(51) See Caussinum de Eloquentia sacra & humana, lib. 2. cap. 10 and 22. p. m. 95, 121.

(52) See Philip Pareus, in Vita Davidis Parei, p. m. 18.

(53) Craolus Paschalius, de optimogenere Elocutionis, p. 153.

(54) Idem, ibid. p. 129.

Quæ priscis memorata Catonibus, atque Cethegis
Nunc situs informis premit, & deserta vetustas *.

* Horat. lib. 2. epist. 2.

" They do not care to join words of a low style " with musty, harsh sounding words, nor with such " as are too obsolete and abstruse, or weak and bu- " ried as it were.

" Us'd by the ancients, tho' consum'd by rage
" Of eating time, and grown deform'd with age.
CREECH.

But it is to be observed, that this very polite Writer is too severe in his censure of Sallust the Historian; and we ought to be guided rather by Passerat, who has perfectly well distinguished the great affectation of the moderns from the liberty which Sallust took (55). I know very well that Asinius Pollio was of opinion that Sallust employed too many antiquated words (56): but perhaps, instead of criticising him with so much severity, he ought rather to have been thanked for reviving certain words, and for preventing their being entirely lost. It were to be wished, that our great Writers would do the like good office with regard to several French words, which are suffered to perish. If these would condescend to employ them, they would put a stop to prescription; they would encourage young writers to make use of them, a circumstance that would preserve the copiousness of our language. Virgil did this, and Horace advises writers to act in this manner.

(55) Passerat. Præf. in Catilinam Sallustii, p. 181.

(56) Asinius Pollio in libro quo Sallustii scripta reprehendit, ut nimis priscorum verborum affectatione oblita. Suet. de illustr. Gram. cap. 10.

Obscurata diu populo bonus eruet atque
Proferet in lucem speciosa vocabula rerum,
Quæ priscis memorata Catonibus (57).

(57) Horat. Ep. 2. lib. 2. ver. 115. See the sequal, in citat. * above.

" Good words, now grown obscure, bring gently " forth,
" Relieve 'em from the dark, and shew their " worth,
" Us'd by the ancients." CREECH.

That is, according to Mr. Dacier's version: " He " will be so good as to revive words, that have been " long dead with regard to the people; and to re- " vive those proper and emphatical words that were " used in the time of Collegus and Cato, but which " are now buried under the rust of time, and the " ruins of antiquity." See the margin (58).

(58) Propriis (verbis) dignitatem dat antiquitas, namque & sanctiorem & magis admirabilem faciunt orationem quibus non quilibet fuerat usurus: eoque ornamento acerrimi judicii P. Virgilius unice est usus . . . sed utendum modo nec ex ultimis tenebris repetenda. Quint. lib. 8. cap. 3. p. m. 364, 365.

I believe that very few persons, at this time of day, in France, have the defect which Passerat attempted to cure. I nevertheless met with the following passage in a work printed in 1685. " There " is a set of literati, whom I should suspect, as those " who intervened in the petition of the late Mr. " Blondel; persons who spend their days, in search- " ing for Archaisms in Seneca and Plautus, in order " to compose some fine theses of a moral and unin- " telligible kind, and such as are not to be explained " by any vocabularies (59)." This Blondel is one of the authors, whom Patin put in parallel with Theophilus Raynaud; but this is an unjust parallel; for a reader may very well understand the writings of this Jesuit, without being obliged to look every moment into Nonius Marcellus, Laurenbergius's Antiquaries, or even Calepin. Nor did he use to intersperse his compositions with Greek words. This was the custom of the most learned Philologers, of whom Casaubon was one, as is manifest from his epistles. Balzac does not approve of that custom (60).

(59) Factum pour Maistre Nicolas Postel, ou Dissert. sur les Peripneumonies, p. 203. See Nouv. de la Republ. des Lettres, January 1680. p. 34.

[K] He . . . . was not spared by the Jansenists.] His eighteenth volume consists of pieces written by him against father Gibieuf, Mr. Arnaud, Mr. de Launoi and some other authors. It cannot be denied but that he has frequently wrote in too severe terms. And indeed it is said that he was determined to suppress a great many things in his compositions, had he not been snatched away by death (61). These last expressions of the Journalist are no more than an officious untruth; it being very probable, that the last edition of father Raynaud's works was agreeable in all respects to his intentions. Read over the following passage (wrote by a Jansenist) wherein it is observed that this Jesuit died without making the least amends to those whom he had abused. " Father Theophilus Raynaud was a " Savoyard (62), who entering among the Jesuits at " sixteen years of age, died, being upwards of four- " score, in the society, which he was going to quit " for the ill usage he had met with in it: inter as- " pera quæ subinde patiebatur, &c. as the Jesuits them- " selves say in the list of their authors. He might " naturally expect this, as he had wrote several books " against the disorders of the society, such as that " entitled *, Theophili Eugenii Protocataslasis, seu prima " Societatis Jesu institutio restauranda, in which he " gives

(60) See his Latin Epistles, p. 170 & seq.

(61) Journal des Savans, of March 14, 1667, p. 124.

(62) This is not accurately expressed; he was born a subject of the Duke of Savoy, but not in Savoy.

* The book entitled, Protocastasis Societatis, was not writ by Theophilus Raynaud.] From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 979. col. 1.

concerning the manner of his death; a circumſtance that is taken notice of, and refuted by Monconys [L]. I have a word or two to ſay againſt Moreri [M]. By the way, I muſt

" gives a ſketch of the reformation he wiſhed to ſee " in the ſociety, in order for the reſtoring it to its " firſt purity: and another entitled by him Hippar- " chus, of the religious Merchant, in oppoſition to " the traffic which was carrying on univerſally in the " ſociety. They likewiſe diſown a treatiſe concern- " ing the diſpenſation from vows (De exſolutione à " votis) which, according to them, was not approved " by their ſuperiors, and contains ſome particulars " with regard to St. Ignatius that are not conform- " able to truth; as alſo, what he writes, in his book " againſt the quondam Jeſuit Julius Clemens Scotus, " an Italian, viz. that the declarations on the con- " ſtitutions of the Jeſuits were not wrote by St. Ig- " natius, but by father Lainez, the ſecond General. " It was probable for one of the two firſt books " that he was thrown into priſon by the Jeſuits, " and was kept in it ſome time. He was free and " bold in his ſentiments, biting and ſatyrical in his " manner of writing, and not a little opinionated; " witneſs his words, where he mentions the ap- " plauſe which was beſtowed on him by a Heretic, " who, he ſaid, had never ſpoke truth except on that " occaſion. What he did, in the ſociety, the year of " his jubilee, is alſo ſingular enough. He ſolem- " nized a magnificent Maſs, when a Jeſuit, getting " up into the pulpit, ſpoke his panegyric before him. " This father had doubtleſs read a prodigious deal. " He wrote 20 volumes in folio, which are a proof " of the eaſe with which he wrote. It were to be " wiſhed that he had wrote with judgment, pru- " dence, modeſty, charity; and prompted by no " other motive than a love for truth. He then " would not have publiſhed ſo many books, filled " with invectives, and the moſt extravagant ſlan- " ders, againſt many particular perſons, ſuch as the " infamous libel entitled, Arnaud de Breſſe reſuſcité " dans Arnauld de Paris (Arnauld of Breſſe revived in " Arnauld of Paris;) nor that ſtuffed with rancour " and gall publiſhed by him againſt the whole or- " der of St. Dominic, and entitled, De Immunitate " Autorum Cyriacorum à Cenſura: Diatribæ Petri à " Valle clauſa S. T. D. This work was condemned " in Rome, with ſeveral others, as the following, " De la Communion pour les morts. Du Martyre par " la peſte. De la Cenſure des bons & des mechans " Livres. i. e. Of the Communion for the dead. Of " Martyrdom by the plague. Of the cenſure of good and " bad books. And the 20th volume which his friends " printed after his death. . . . This father died at " Lyons, he being ſeized with an apoplectic fit the " laſt of October 1663, without having made the " leaſt ſatisfaction for the ſlanders with which a great " number of his compoſitions abound (63)."

(63) Addition à la 3 Lettre du Prince de Conti au Pere de Champs, p. 69. edit. of Cologne 1689.

[L] His enemies ſpread ſtrange reports concerning the manner of his death, a circumſtance that is . . . refuted by Monconys.] The paſſage I am going to tranſcribe is of a conſiderable length; but no matter; there are ſome particulars in it which the relator himſelf perhaps did not believe. " As I told him " (64), that I was a native of Lyons, he inſtantly " inquired of me concerning the death of father " Theophilus Raynaud. I told him, that I was at " Lyons when he died; and that my brother, who " was come from Paris when he was cut for the " ſtone, had often diſcourſed with him. He then " drew forth a letter ſent from father Henſchenius, " whoſe library I had ſeen in Antwerp; wherein he " wrote word to him, that the Dominicans have " ſpread a report in Flanders and Rome, that father " Theophilus died diſtracted; that the Jeſuits had " deprived him of the Sacraments; that he ran up " and down their monaſtery in Lyons, crying like one " of the damned, Philiſtini ſuper me; (the Philiſtines " are upon me;) and that having been buried ſepul- " tura Aſini, (with the burial of an aſs;) he was dug " up the next day, and his body all over livid, occa- " ſioned by his being beat by devils during the " whole night. I told him that this was mere " calumny, and a ridiculous report; the good father " in queſtion not having been able to ſay Maſs " during a fortnight, and having received the Sacra- " ment every day. That he had made three general " confeſſions to father du Lieu, the week he died. " Even the morning of the day on which he died, " which happened the eve of All-Saints laſt year, " after having had viſible warnings of it, he thrice " bid farewel to the Frier who aſſiſted him in put- " ting on his clothes, aſſuring him that this would " be the laſt time he ſhould give him any trouble; " and that, returning from the Chapel, where he " had heard Maſs and received the Sacrament, he " ſaid to a Frier he met with, that he had beſought " God to let him ſpend the feaſt of All-Saints in " Heaven; and a moment after, about half an hour " after the Communion, he expired as he was going " into his chamber, he died in the arms of another " good brother; and in this manner was fulfilled " his prophecy, viz. that he would die in his caſſock, " and in his chamber, both which he loved ſo well, " that no perſecution could force him from the ſtate " of life he had embraced in his infancy; he hav- " ing never quitted, during threeſcore years, the ſo- " litude of his cell, except to perform acts of cha- " rity, ſuch as, to confeſs the meaneſt peaſant, at " what time ſoever he might addreſs him. I told " him that the Church of Lyons had performed a " ſolemn ſervice to his memory, in St. Juſtus's Chapel, " where a Council was held; that the like ſervice " had been ſolemnized by the Carmelites and Car- " thuſians, at Lyons, as had their whole order; and " that the congregations of the Gentlemen of Lyons " had ſaid the office in their Chapel; and attended, " in a body, at his funeral. I told him that my " brother, who did not give credit too highly to " ſecret revelations, had often told me, that when " father Theophilus was greatly grieved, in Avig- " non, on account of his book de Negotiatore reli- " gioſo (of the religious Merchant) a bare-footed Car- " melite recommending him to the prayers of a " Carmelite nun, who was looked upon as a holy wo- " man in Avignon, without telling her his name; " this man anſwered, that the man for whom he " deſired her prayers was one of the moſt learned " men in the Church, and very acceptable to God; " but that, to exerciſe his virtue and heighten his " merit, our Lord had thought proper to mortify " him in that thing which he was moſt paſſionately " fond of, that is, his compoſitions, the whole glory " and reward of which was reſerved to him till af- " ter his death, and that then all the provinces of " the world would eagerly ſeek for them. Obſerv- " ing that he liſtened to me with extreme pleaſure, " I added what the Prior Jugeact of Lyons had in- " formed me concerning the modeſty of father Theo- " philus, whom his adverſaries ought to imitate, viz. " his having refuſed the Biſhopric of Geneva, after " the death of the nephew of the bleſſed Francis " de Sales; that Don Felix of Savoy, and the whole " Senate of Chamberri, having obtained the con- " ſent of Duke Charles Emanuel, father Theophile " was the only perſon who oppoſed it, and was ſo " urgent in this, that they were forced to deſiſt, " which circumſtance the ſaid Prior aſſured me he " knew to be fact; but that he himſelf had been " witneſs to an act of the moſt heroic virtue, for " that having been ordered, by the late Archbiſhop " of Bourdeaux, and ſome other perſons, to preſent " father Theophilus, in his adverſity, to ſome bene- " fices, and two thouſand livres a year, with a city- " ſecurity in Lyons, upon condition that he would " write in favour of a certain doctrine; father Ray- " naud made the following noble anſwer to Mr. " Jugeact, (kiſſing at the ſame time his caſſock) that " he would die under perſecution in that habit, " rather than live at eaſe, and be wanting in fide- " lity to God to whom he had devoted it (65)." If Friers did not ſcruple to ſpread ſuch reports againſt a Jeſuit, are we to wonder that they publiſhed ſuch fictions concerning the death of Luther, Calvin &c?

(64) i. e. To a Jeſuit of Lanſberg, in Bavaria.

(65) Moncony's, Voyages, part. 2. p. 386 & ſeq. Lyons edit. 1665. ad ann. 1664.

[M] I have a word or two to ſay againſt Moreri.] I. As all the beſt part of what he ſays is found in the very ſame words in the Journal des Savans (66), he ought to have informed his readers of the book whence must obſerve, that Father Theophilus Raynaud frequently diſguiſed his name in the title of his works [N]. He is greatly applauded by the Carmelites; and they paid him funeral honours in all the monaſteries of their Order, anno 1663 (e). The honours thus paid him were on account of his book concerning the Scapulary, which one of that Order publiſhed, with many alterations [O]. The catalogue he himſelf publiſhed of his own whence he borrowed that Article. This is ſuch an omiſſion that he deſerves to be called a plagiary on that account, and to have the following words of Pliny applied to him: Obnoxii profecto animi & infelicis ingenii eſt deprehendi in furto malle, quam mutuum reddere (67). i. e. "It is the indication of a "depraved mind, and an unlucky genius, to chooſe "rather to be catched in a theft, than to repay what "one may have borrowed." II. Father Theophilus had not made choice, for the title of the collection of his works, of the word Apopompæus, the name which the Jews uſed to give to the victim they loaded with curſes, and abandoned in the deſert; but it was not thought proper to imploy ſuch a title. The title Apopompæus was deſigned only for the particular collection of ſome pieces, which the author did not inſert in his XIXth volume. The reader has ſeen above the words of Abbé Gallois, which are ſo very clear, that it is ſurprizing Moreri ſhould not underſtand them. Muſt not this Jeſuit have been out of his ſenſes, had he deſigned to give this title to all his works? He muſt neceſſarily have reſerved this title for ſome prohibited treatiſes; and his intention was complied with, according to father Sotuel, which ſhews that Moreri was guilty of another omiſſion. III. Raynaud's works were not printed in 1667, the edition being completed in 1665. The circumſtance which miſled Moreri is, his finding the 14th of March 1667 mentioned in the Journal des Savans. This ſhould prompt the Journaliſts to mention always the year in which a book was printed; which they did not uſe to do at firſt, and particularly when they were afraid, that the mentioning the date would ſhew that they were writing on a book which had loſt the graces of novelty. IV. This Jeſuit did not live in the XVIth century. This error is found only in the ſecond Dutch edition.

(66) It is the Journal of March 14, 1667. cited by me above, rem. [G].

(e) Papebroch. Reſponſ. ad Exhibit. Error. p. 117.

(67) Plin. in Præf.

(68) In the catalogue annexed by him, to his work entitled, Auteurs deguiſez (Diſguiſed Authors).

(69) See Sotuel, Bibl. Script. Soc. Jeſu, p. 758.

(70) Placcius, de Anonymis, num. 602. p. 130.

(71) I am to obſerve, that this means a native of Cemelia. This was an epiſcopal city that has been long ruined. The epiſcopal See was united to that of Nice. See Theophilus Raynaud, de Libris propriis, p. m. 29.

(72) He was a Spaniſh Monk, of the Order of the Ciſtercians. He publiſhed this chronicle of Flavius Dexter, with commentaries, at Lyons, in 1627.

(73) Placcius, in Pſeudonymorum Catalogo, num. 294. p. 185.

[N] Raynaud frequently diſguiſed his name in the title of his works.] Baillet will have employment enough, in the noble collection, on diſguiſed authors, which the publick expects from him. He is in doubt (68) whether this jeſuit aſſumed the name of Anſelm Solerius, in the book de pileo, cæteriſque capitis tegminibus; but ſince this book is in the XIIIth volume of this father's works (69), we may be aſſured that it was wrote by him. Placcius (70) is miſtaken in ſuppoſing, that it was publiſhed without a name, in the Lyons edition of 1655, 4to, dedicated ad Petrum de Macerat: but that, in the Amſterdam edition 1671, 12mo, it was printed with the name of Anſelmus Solerius Cimmelienſis. It is certain that the author, in the Lyons edition of 1665, called himſelf, Anſelmus Solerius Cemelienſis, dedicating his work ad Patrum de Maridat. I therefore may affirm that Placcius was ignorant of a great many particulars in this article. He did not know the names that were printed in the firſt edition. Macerat is a mere chimæra; Maridat is the true name of a Counſellor of the great Council; Anſelmus Solerius Cemelienſis (71) was a maſk with which our Theophilus concealed himſelf. Placcius reproaches him, without a cauſe, with being guilty of a kind of contradiction (I obſerve this by the by) with regard to Flavius Dexter's chronicle. Illud (Chronicon) ab ipſo BIVARIO (72), vel VIVARIO confictum credidere Gabriel Pennottus & Matthæus Raderus, contra quos ipſe tamen Apologiis ſeſe binis defendit quas approbant Carolus Viſch Bibl. Ciſtercienſis p. 114. & Th. Ranaud. de mal. & bon. lib. pag. 139. ſibi fere contrarius pag. 164 (73). Theſe are Placcius's words. He declares that our Jeſuit having approved (page 139) the apologies of the Spaniſh Monk, diſapproves them in page 164. But this is far from being the caſe. He deſpiſes them evidently enough in page 164, and ſtill more ſo in page 139. Flavii Dextri Chronicon nuper vulgatum, ſuppoſitum fuiſſe Dextro, latè contendit Gabriel Pennotus in Canonicorum Regularium hiſtoria. Quamvis enim, ipſo S. Hieronymo teſte ratum ſit, Flavium Dextrum ſcripſiſſe Chronicon quod eidem D. Hieronymo inſcripſerit; tamen hoc Chronicum nuper vulgatum, illud ipſum eſſe genuinum, cujus S. Hieronymus meminit, multa ſunt quæ diſſuadent. Nec quæ adversùs libri illius ſuppoſitionem, proferunt Bivarius commentator ac defenſor & Melchior Incofer lib. pro epiſtola Deiparæ ad Meſſanenſes à cap. 42. ad 46. explent revera legentis animum (74). i. e. "Gabriel "Pennotus, in his hiſtory of the Canons regular, "argues very warmly, to prove that the work en"titled Flavius Dexter's chronicle, lately publiſhed, "was not written by Dexter. For though it is cer"tain, by the teſtimony of St. Jerom himſelf, that "Flavius Dexter wrote a chronicle which he in"ſcribed to the ſaid St. Jerom; nevertheleſs many "arguments might be produced to ſhew that this "chronicle in queſtion was not the genuine one men"tioned by that Saint: nor do the reaſons alledged "in favour of the genuineſs of that work, by Biva"rius his commentator and defender, and Melchior "Incofer in his work concerning the Bleſſed Virgin, "fully ſatisfy the reader." Theſe are his words in page 139, and in page 164 he ſpeaks as follows: Flavii Dextri Chronicon quod nuper prodiit, magna excitavit diſſidia. Aliquod Chronicon verè fuiſſe à Dextro conſcriptum, conſtat, cum S. Hieronymus ejus ſibi à Dextro inſcripti meminerit; ſed an id quod nuper prodiit, ſit verum illud Dextri Chronicon, controverſia eſt. Multi hoc Chronicon eſſe ſuppoſitum ab aliquo, cui honor gentis ſuæ cordi eſſet, contendunt, & acriter Pennotus in Canonicorum Regularium Hiſtoria (75). i. e. "The lately "publiſhed chronicle of Flavius Dexter has occaſioned "many diſputes. It is certain that Dexter really wrote "ſome Chronicle, ſince St. Jerom takes notice of "ſuch a work dedicated to himſelf, written by Dex"ter; but it is ſtill diſputed whether that lately pub"liſhed is Dexter's true Chronicle. Several Authors, "(and among others Pennotus, in his Hiſtory of the "Canons regular, who wrote with great warmth on "this occaſion) affirm, that this Chronicle was forged "by ſome Writer, who was ſtrongly deſirous of ad"vancing the honour of his native country." Our Jeſuit aſſumed the name of Stephanus Emonerius, when he wrote againſt Barnes, in favour of equivocations (76); that of J. Heribertus Cemelienſis in his Latin treatiſe concerning Eunuchs (77); that of Leodegarius Quintinus Hæduus, in writing againſt Hurtado, &c. This Hurtado was a Spaniſh Monk, who printed in Amſterdam the book mentioned by Patin (78); where (79) he laughs at ſome of the titles which Theophilus Raynaud gave to ſome of his books. But, by his favour, the titles in queſtion were ſometimes ingenious. Who would not be deſirous of reading Heteroclita ſpiritualia & Anomala pietatis, which is the title of the 15th and 16th volumes of this Jeſuit's works? So, will ſome ſay, there are heteroclites in religion as well as in grammar, and anomalies therein as in the moon.

(74) Theoph. Raynaud. de malis ac bonis Libris, num. 220. p. m. 139.

(75) Idem, ibid. num. 296. p. 164.

(76) See the art. BARNES, rem. [D].

(77) Printed at Dijon in 4to, anno 1655.

(78) Citat. (22) above.

(79) See the Preface to Duplex Antidotus, art. 1.

Some imagine that the pretended Amadæus Guimenius, whoſe works, on account of the looſe morality inculcated in them, have made ſo much noiſe, was really Theophilus Raynaud's. Father Baron ſuppoſes this in the ſecond part of his Manuductio ad Moralem Theologiam (80): but afterwards diſcovering that Amadæus's work, which he was refuting, was writ by a Spaniſh Author, he retracted it in his Preface: and it is certain, adds Abbé Gallois, that the ſtyle and manner in which Guimenius's book is writ, is no ways like that of Father Theophilus Raynaud. I am to obſerve, it was by other methods that the work in queſtion was found to have been writ by Moya the Jeſuit, confeſſor to the Queen of Spain; notwithſtanding the diverſity of ſtyle, which is one way of leading into error, Raynaud was publickly charged with it, nor did it clear him.

(80) Gallois, Journal des Savans, April 12, 1666. p. m. 39.

[O] A Carmelite publiſhed one of his pieces with many alterations.] Ye poſthumous writings and manuſcripts own works, has been very acceptable to the curious. It is a very good piece in its kind. It had been publiſhed ſeparately; but it afterwards was prefixed to the 20th volume of his works, and which is entitled, Apopompæus. In this catalogue is ſhewn the occaſion and ſubject of each of that Writer's books; and the conſequences with which they were attended, I mean, who the perſons were that attacked them; the anſwers that were made to them, and other particulars of the like nature, very pleaſing to ſuch as love to read the hiſtory of books and authors. One circumſtance (a pretty important one) is wanting in it; I mean, that the chronological order is very imperfectly obſerved in it. In this catalogue we find, that ſuch a work was the firſt our Author publiſhed; that ſuch a work is the ſecond, the third, and ſo on; but we do not there find either the date of the year, the place where printed, nor the number nor date of the editions which followed the firſt. Thoſe who imagined that the Bookſeller, who undertook an edition of the works of this Jeſuit in 20 volumes in folio, would be ruined by that means, were greatly miſtaken [P].

nuſcripts that come from far diſtant countries, how can we rely upon you? Who can aſſure us that nothing has been added to, nor taken from them, ſince a manuſcript of Father Raynaud was ſo much altered by a Carmelite, during the Author's life, and almoſt at his door? Our Jeſuit had diſplayed all his learning in defenſe of the Scapulary of Simon Stock; but the parties whom this performance chiefly concerned were not ſatisfied with it. Hence they wretchedly mangled his book in many places, and foiſted ſome things into it. Raynaud was greatly offended at this, and expreſſed his indignation in the following manner. Hoc opuſculum (Scapulare Stochianum illuſtratum & defenſum) quale Pariſiis è meo M. S. prodiit anno 1654 apud Antonium Padelore, abjudico tamquam ſpurium & alienum. Irruit enim in illud Leo; à quo miſerè deformatum eſt, dicam diſcerptum & laceratum. Reciſa pleriſque locis, me inconſulto, multa; addita ex mente interpolatoris alia, quæ planè improbo. Titulus ipſe libri, (ut ab ipſo limine fieret perverſionis exordium) immutatus eſt; ita ut quod Hincmarus ſenior juniori exprobrabat, admiſſa in ipſo aditu ceſpitatione, non potuerit expectari progreſſio felicior. Hiat paſſim oratio, ob prætermiſſionem vel reciſionem unius aut alterius voculæ, menda ubique denſa. Sic rependitur gratia (81)? i. e. "This work "(the Scapulary of Simon Stock illuſtrated and "defended) as publiſhed at Paris by Anthony "Padelore in 1654, from my manuſcript, I reject "as ſpurious and corrupt; for the lion ruſhing in "defaced and mangled it in a wretched man-"ner. Many paſſages, without my being once con-"ſulted, were ſuppreſſed; and others added merely "according to the interpolator's fancy, all which I "utterly diſapprove. The very title of the book "(that they might begin the devaſtation at the en-"trance) is changed; ſo that I may make him the "ſame reproach as Hincmarus the elder did to the "younger, viz. that ſince they ſtumbled at their "firſt ſetting out, it might naturally be expected that "their journey would be proportionably unſucceſsful. "The ſenſe is often rendered imperfect, by the "omiſſion or retrenching of one or more words; "and there are every where a great number of errors. "Muſt my kindneſs be thus rewarded?"

(81) Theoph. Raynaud. in Syntagm. de Libris propriis, num. 72. p. m. 70, 71.

[P] Thoſe who imagined that the bookſeller who undertook it, would be ruined, were greatly miſtaken.] This edition ſold very well; and when it is found complete, in the auctions (of books) in Holland and Germany, it generally goes at a very high price *. The printer therefore did not deſerve to be ranked in a certain catalogue, mentioned by Catherinot. I "was ending this article, ſays he (83), when the re-"verend Father de Fourcroy, a Jeſuit of Paris, but "an inhabitant of Bourges for upwards of fifty years, "during all which time he has taught or writ books, "hinted to me that one might make a book, of a "tolerable ſize, only of ſuch Authors whoſe works had "entirely ruined their bookſellers: but this ſhall ſerve "for another occaſion." This brings to my memory the following paſſage of Stephen Paſquier (83). "I "cannot forbear to ſpeak my mind on this occaſion, "and to complain aloud of the calamity of this age, "which has given birth to ſo great a number of pre-"tended or half-formed Authors. The moſt wretched "ſcribler wants to have the firſt ſtarts of his fancy "made public; fearing, if they ſhould be too long "ſhut up, they ſhould grow muſty (84). Good Lord! "methinks the ſix following verſes of Jodelle are "very happy:

"Et tant ceux d'aujourd'huy me faſchent,
"Qui dés lors que leurs plumes laſchent
"Quelque trait ſoit mauvais ou bon,
"En lumiere le vont produire,
"Pour ſouvent avec leur renom,
"Les pauvres Imprimeurs deſtruire.

"The ſcriblers all my indignation raiſe;
"Scriblers, who when they hit upon a thought,
"Or good or bad, will publiſh it that inſtant,
"Thus whilſt theſe Elfs attempt to gain a name,
"Their bibliopoles are ruin'd and undone."

* The Printer who undertook this edition of Theophilus Raynaud's works, ruined himſelf.] From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 979. col. 1.

(82) Catherinot, l'Art d'imprimer p. 2. It is a pamphlet of 12 pages in 4to, dated at Bourges, March 10, 1685.

(83) Paſquier, Lettres, liv. 10. Tom. 1. p. m. 638.

(84) That is ruſty, muſty, pædorem & ſitum.

☞ RAYNOLDS or RAINOLDS (JOHN), an eminent Engliſh Divine in the 16th century, fifth ſon of Richard Rainolds of Pinho, near Exeter in Devonſhire, was born there in the year 1549 (a). He became Student of Merton college in Oxford, in 1562; and on the 29th of April the year following, was admitted Scholar of Corpus Chriſti college; and on the 11th of October, 1566, was choſen Probationer Fellow (b). October the 15th, 1568, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c); and May the 17th, 1572, that of Maſter (d), being then Senior of the Act, and Greek Lecturer in his college (e). June the 24th, 1579, he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity (f); and in June 1585 that of Doctor (g). In 1598 he was made Dean of Lincoln; about which time he lodged and ſtudied in Queen's College. But being unwilling to quit an academical life, he exchanged his Deanry the year following with Mr. Will. Cole for the Preſidentſhip of Corpus Chriſti College. Queen Elizabeth offered him a Biſhoprick, which he modeſty refuſed (h). He publiſhed ſeveral works [A]. Dr. Daniel

(a) Prince's Worthies of Devon, p. 524.

(b) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 339. 2d edit.

(c) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 102.

(d) Idem, ibid. col. 106.

(e) Idem, Athen. Oxon. Ubi ſupra.

(f) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 119.

(g) Idem, ibid. col. 129.

(h) Idem, Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral works.] I. Sermon of the Deſtruction of the Idumæans, on Obad. ver. 5, 6. London 1584 in 8vo. II. The Summe of a conference between John Rainoldes and John Hart, touching the head and faith of the Church. Wherein by the way are handled ſundrie points of the ſufficiencie and right expounding of the ſcriptures, the miniſterie of the Church, the function of Prieſthood, the ſacrifice of the Maſſe, with other controverſies of religion; but chiefly and purpoſely the point of Church Government, opened in the branches of Chriſte's ſupreme ſoverainty, of Peter's pretended, the Pope's uſurped, the Prince's lawful ſupremacie. Penned by John Rainoldes, according to the notes ſet downe in writing by them both; peruſed by John

(i) Orat. Funebr. J. Rainoldi.

(k) Epiſt. 7. Decad 1.

(l) Defenſ. Eccleſ. Angl. c. 69.

(m) Wood, Athen. Oxon. col. 340.

(n) Hakewill's Apology of the Power and Government of God, l. 3. c. 6. ſect. 1. p. 226. edit. London 1630.

Daniel Featly tells us (i), that he was a man of prodigious reading, and erudition. Biſhop Hall obſerves (k), that "he alone was a well furniſhed library, full of all faculties, of all ſtudies, of all learning. The memory, the reading of that man were to a miracle." And Dr. Crakanthorp ſays (l), "that for virtue, probity, integrity, and piety, he was ſo eminent, that as Nazianzen ſpeaks of Athanaſius, it might be ſaid of him, to name Rainolds is to commend virtue itſelf." He was indeed verſed in all kinds of learning, and had read over all writers, profane, eccleſiaſtical, and divine, all the councils, fathers, and hiſtories of the church; and was admirably ſkilled in a variety of languages, of an excellent genius, and ſound judgment (m). His memory was ſuch, that, "he excelled this way, to the aſtoniſhment of all that were inwardly acquainted with him, not only for St. Auguſtin's works, but almoſt all Claſſic Authors; ſo as in this reſpect it might truly be ſaid of him, which hath been applied to ſome others, that he was a living Library, or third Univerſity (n)". He had a hand in tranſlating part of the Old Teſtament, by command of King James I. Some time before his death, he was extremely afflicted with the gout, and at laſt fell into a conſumption, of which he died. All the time of his ſickneſs, except when he conferred with the tranſlators of the bible, who met at his lodgings, was ſpent in devotion or reading, to which he had ſo intenſely applied himſelf, that when ſome of his friends formerly endeavoured to perſuade him to abate ſomething of his ſtudies, which otherwiſe might encreaſe thoſe diſeaſes that would haſten his death, and that he ſhould not perdere ſubſtantiam propter accidentia, his reply was, nec propter Vitam vivendi perdere cauſas. He died on Thurſday May

John Hart, and (after things ſupplied and altered, as he thought good) allowed for the faithfull report of that which paſt in conference betwene them. Whereto is annexed a treatiſe, entitled, Six Concluſions touching the holie Scripture and the Church, written by John Rainoldes. With a defenſe of ſuch things as Thomas Stapleton and Gregorie Martin have carped at there. London 1584 in 4to. Reprinted there in 1588, 1598, and 1609 in 4to. This book was tranſlated into Latin by Henry Parry of Corpus Chriſti College. The dedication of Dr. Rainolds's Conference to the Earl of Leiceſter is dated at London July the 18th 1584. Mr. Hart in his epiſtle to the indifferent Reader acknowledges, that what Dr. Rainolds hath ſet down is a true report of thoſe things, which paſt in conference between them; "and as for that, ſays he, which he affirmeth in one place (1), that I have told him, that my opinion is, the Pope may not depoſe Princes; indeede I told him ſo much. And in truth I thinke, that although the ſpiritual power be more excellent and worthie than the temporall, yet they are both of God, neither doth the one depend of the other. Whereupon I gather as a certaine concluſion, that the opinion of them, who holde the Pope to be a temporal Lord over Kings and Princes, is unreaſonable and unprobable altogether. For he hath not to meddle with them civilly, much leſſe to depoſe them, or give away their kingdomes: that is no part of his commiſſion. He hath in my judgment the fatherhoode of the Church, not a Princehood of the world, Chriſt having taken no ſuch title upon him, nor giving it to Peter, or any other of his diſciples. And that is it, which I meant to defend in him, and no other Soveraintie." The Six concluſions touching the holy Scripture and the Church, ſubjoined to this work, were defended by our author in 1579, and were likewiſe printed in Latin. The preface of them is dated at Corpus Chriſti College February the 2d. 1580. They are as follow. 1. The holy Scripture teacheth the Church all things neceſſary to Salvation. 2. The militant Church may err, both in manners, and in doctrine. 3. The authority of the holy Scripture is greater than the authority of the Church. 4. The holy Catholic Church, which we believe, is the whole company of God's elect and choſen. 5. The Church of Rome is not the Catholic Church, nor a ſound Member of the Catholic Church. 6. The Reformed Churches in England, Scotland, France, Germany, and other Kingdoms and Common-Weales, have ſevered themſelves lawfully from the Church of Rome. III. A Sermon preached to the publick Aſſembly of Scholars in the Univerſity of Oxford, ult. Auguſt. 1586. upon occaſion of their meeting to give thanks for the late detection and apprehenſion of Traytors, who wickedly conſpired againſt the Queen's Majeſty, &c. on Pſalm xviii. 48, 49, 50, 51. Oxford 1586 in 8vo, IV. Orationes duæ in Collegio Corporis Chriſti. Oxford 1587 in 8vo. V. De Romanæ, Eccleſiæ Idololatriâ, in cultu Sanctorum, Reliquiarum, Imaginum, &c. Libr. 2. Oxford 1596 in 4to. VI. The Overthrow of Stage-plays by way of controverſie betwixt Dr. Gager and Dr. Rainolds, wherein all the Reaſons that can be made for them, are notably refuted, &c. Finiſhed in 1593, and ſaid to be printed at Middleburg in 1599 in 4to. Printed alſo at Oxford 1629 in 4to, to which are added ſeveral Latin letters between our author and Albericus Gentilis upon the ſame ſubject. VII. Apologia theſium de ſacrâ Scripturâ & Eccleſiâ. London 1602 in 8vo. VIII. Epiſtle to Thomas Pye, printed at the end of Robert Burhill's book intitled, In controverſiam &c. in ſex commentationes. Oxford 1606 in 4to written upon Mr. Pye's ſubmitting his Latin epiſtle againſt Dr. Howſon's Theſis, to his cenſure. It contains alſo ſeveral corrections of Mr. Pye's Epiſtle, before it went to the preſs. IX. Defence of the Judgment of the Reformed Churches, that a man may lawfully, not only put away his wife for her Adultery, but alſo marry another. Wherein Robert Bellarmine, the Jeſuit's Latin treatiſe and an Engliſh pamphlet of a nameleſs author, maintaining the contrary, are confuted. Printed in 1609 in 4to. X. Cenſura Librorum Apocryphorum veteris Teſtamenti adverſus Pontificios, imprimis Robertum Bellarminum, &c. Oppenheim 1611 in two tomes. Mr. Matthew Pole tells us (2), that this book is written multijugâ & ſtupendâ Eruditione. XI. The Prophely of Obadiah opened and applied in ſundry learned and gracious Sermons preached at Allhallows and St. Mary's in Oxford. Oxford 1613 in 4to. Publiſhed by Will. Hind of Queen's College. XII. Letter to his friend, containing his advice for the ſtudy of Divinity, dated July 4th 1577. London 1613 in 12mo. XIII. Orationes duodecim, cum aliis quibuſdam opuſculis. Adjecta eſt Oratio Funebris in obitu ejuſdem habita à M. Iſaaco Wake, Oratore publico. London 1619 in 8vo. Mr. Wood mentions an edition of the Orationes duodecim at Oxford 1614 in 8vo, and another in 1628. Among theſe are the two Orations printed in 1587. The reſt were publiſhed by Henry Jackſon, B. D. That, which was pronounced poſt Feſtum Michaelis 1573, and begins thus; Si quis adſit in hoc Coventu, &c. was tranſlated into Engliſh by John Leiceſter of Cheſhire, for the uſe of all ſuch that affect the ſtudies of Logic and Philoſophy, London 1638 in 12mo. There are publiſhed with theſe orations Epiſtolæ ad Guliel. Rainoldum, Fratrem ſuum, Gulielm. Whitakerum, & Elizabetham Reginam. And in the edition of 1619 are publiſhed, Plutarchi Chæronenſis Libr. duo; 1. De utilitate ex hoſtibus capiendâ, 2. De morbis animi & corporis. D. Johanne Rainoldo interprete. And Maximi Tyrii Platonici Diſputationes tres: 1. Vitam activam contemplativâ; 2. Contemplativam activâ meliorem eſſe. 3. Qui morbi graviores, animi, an corporis, D. Johanne Rainoldo interprete. XIV. The diſcovery

(1) In the 7th chapter, and 7th diviſion.

(2) Synopſis, vol. 3.

May the 21ſt 1607, in the fifty eighth year of his age, and was interred with great ſolemnity on the Monday following in the Chapel of Corpus Chriſti College, where a monument is erected to his memory. He was inclined to Puritaniſm, though with ſuch moderation, that he continued a Conformiſt to the Church of England [B].

of the man of Sin, a Sermon on 2 Theſſal. ii. 3. Oxford 1614 in 4to, publiſhed by Mr. William Hind abovementioned. XV. A letter to Sir Francis Knollys concerning ſome paſſages in Dr. Richard Bancroft's Sermon at Paul's-croſs, 9 Febr. 1588. London 1641 in 4to. XVI. The Original of Biſhops and Metropolitans briefly laid down. Oxford 1641 in 4to. This is but a ſmall piece, and included in Archbiſhop Uſher's diſcourſe upon that ſubject. Other titles have it thus: Dr. Rainolds his Judgment touching the Original of Epiſcopacy more largely confirmed out of Antiquity by James Uſher Archbiſhop of Armagh. XVII. A Judgment concerning Epiſcopacy, whether it be God's ordinance. In a letter to Sir Francis Knollys Knt. 19 September 1598. London 1641 in 4to. XVIII. Propheſie of Haggai interpreted and applied in fifteen Sermons. London 1649 in 4to. Publiſhed by Edward Leigh Eſq; who had the copy from Nath. Hind, a Miniſter of Staffordſhire, ſon of William Hind beforementioned, who had reviſed and perfected it. Our Author's manuſcripts mentioned by Mr. Wood are as follow. 1. Commentarii in tres Libros Ariſtotelis de Rhetoricâ. 2. An Anſwer to Nich. Saunders's books de ſchiſmate Anglicano, in defenſe of our Reformation, &c. 3. A Defenſe of our Engliſh liturgy againſt Robert Browne's ſchiſmatical books. This Browne, who was a Knight's ſon of Rutlandſhire, and educated at Cambridge, was Author of the ſect called Browniſts; but afterwards reconciled himſelf to the Church of England, and became Miniſter of Aychurch in Northamptonſhire. He died about the year of his age, in 1630, or, as ſome ſay, 1634 (3). 4. A Treatiſe of the beginning and progreſs of Popiſh errors, and that for the firſt 300 years after Chriſt Biſhops ruled their own Dioceſes without ſubjection to the Pope. 5. Collectanea quædam, potiſſimè Theologica. In the library of Dr. Tho. Barlow Biſhop of Lincoln. 7. Collectanea continentia diverſa Rhetorica & Theologica, MS. in 8vo in the ſame library. 8. Several Orations and Declamations, not yet printed, in the ſame library.

(3) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 341. 2d edit.

[B] He was inclined to Puritaniſm, though with ſuch moderation, that he continued a Conformiſt to the Church of England.] He was one of the managers for the Puritans at the Conference at Hampton Court in January 1603, at which he propoſed, I. That the Doctrine of the Church might be preſerved in purity, according to God's word. II. That good Paſtors might be planted in all Churches to preach the ſame. III. That the Church-Government might be ſincerely miniſtred according to God's word. IV. That the book of Common Prayer might be fitted to the more encreaſe of Piety (4).

(4) The Summe and Subſtance of the Conference, &c. in his Majeſtie's Privy Chamber at Hampton Court, January 14. 1603. Contracted by William Barlow, D. D. p. 23. edit. London 1604.

For the firſt he moved his Majeſty, that the book of Articles of Religion concluded in 1562 might be explained in places obſcure, and enlarged where ſome things were defective. For example, whereas Art. 16. the words are theſe, After we have received the Holy Ghoſt, we may depart from Grace; notwithſtanding the meaning may be ſound, yet he deſired, that becauſe they may ſeem to be contrary to the doctrine of God's Predeſtination and Election in the 17th Article, both theſe words might be explained with this or the like addition, yet neither totally nor finally; and alſo that the nine aſſertions orthodoxall, as he termed them, concluded upon at Lambeth, might be inſerted into that book of articles. Secondly, where it is ſaid in the 23d Article, that it is not lawful for any man to take upon him the office of preaching or adminiſtring the Sacraments in the congregation, before he be lawfully called, Dr. Rainolds took exception to theſe words, in the congregation, as implying a lawfulneſs for any whatſoever, out of the congregation, to preach and adminiſter the Sacraments, though he had no lawful calling thereunto. Thirdly, in the 25th Article, theſe words touching Confirmation, grown partly of the corrupt following the Apoſtles, being oppoſite to thoſe in the Collect of Confirmation in the Communion-book, upon whom after the example of the Apoſtles, argue, ſaid he, a contrariety each to other; the firſt confeſſing Confirmation to be a depraved imitation of the Apoſtles; the ſecond grounding it upon their example, Acts viii. and 19. as if the Biſhop by confirming of Children, did by impoſing of hands, as the Apoſtles in thoſe places, give the viſible Graces of the Holy Ghoſt. And therefore he deſired, that both the contradiction might be conſidered, and this ground of Confirmation examined (5). Dr. Rainolds afterwards objected to a defect in the 37th Article, wherein, he ſaid, theſe words, The Biſhop of Rome hath no authority in this land, were not ſufficient, unleſs it were added, nor ought to have (6). He next moved, that this propoſition, the intention of the Miniſter is not of the eſſence of the Sacrament, might be added unto the book of Articles, the rather becauſe ſome in England had preached it to be eſſential. And here again he repeated his requeſt concerning the nine orthodoxall aſſertions concluded at Lambeth (7). He then complained, that the Catechiſm in the Common-Prayer-Book was too brief; for which reaſon one by Nowel, late Dean of St. Paul's, was added, and that too long for young novices to learn by heart. He requeſted therefore, that one uniform Catechiſm might be made, which, and none other, might be generally received (8). He next took notice of the profanation of the Sabbath, and the contempt of his Majeſty's proclamation for reforming that abuſe; and deſired ſome ſtronger remedy might be applied (9). His next requeſt was for a new tranſlation of the Bible, becauſe thoſe which were allowed in the reign of Henry VIII and Edward VI. were corrupt and not anſwerable to the original; of which he gave three inſtances (10). He then deſired his Majeſty, that unlawful and ſeditious books might be ſuppreſſed, at leaſt reſtrained, and imparted to a few. He proceeded now to the ſecond point, and deſired that learned Miniſters might be planted in every pariſh (11). He next went on to the fourth point relating to the Common-Prayer, and complained of the impoſing Subſcription, ſince it was a great impediment to a learned Miniſtry; and intreated, that "it might "not be exacted as formerly, for which many good "men were kept out, others removed, and many "diſquieted. To ſubſcribe according to the Sta"tutes of the Realm, namely to the Articles of Re"ligion, and the King's ſupremacy, they were not "unwilling. Their reaſon of their backwardneſs to "ſubſcribe otherwiſe was, firſt, the books Apocryphal, "which the Common-Prayer enjoined to be read in "the Church, albeit there are, in ſome of thoſe "chapters appointed, manifeſt errors, directly repug"nant to the Scriptures (12). . . . . The next ſcru"ple againſt ſubſcription was, that in the Common "Prayer it is twice ſet down, Jeſus ſaid to his Diſciples, when as by the text original it is plain, "that he ſpake to the Phariſees. . . . . The third "objection againſt ſubſcription were Interrogatories in "Baptiſm, propounded to infants (13)." Dr. Rainolds owned the uſe of the Croſs to have been ever ſince the Apoſtles time; but this was the difficulty, to prove it of that ancient uſe in Baptiſm (14). He afterwards took exceptions at thoſe words in the Office of Matrimony. With my body I thee worſhip (15); and objected againſt the Churching of women by the name of Purification (16). Under the third general head touching Diſcipline he took exception to the committing of Eccleſiaſtical cenſures to Lay-Chancellors. "His reaſon was, that the Statute made in King "Henry's time for their authority that way was "abrogated in Queen Mary's time, and not revived "in the late Queen's days, and abridged by the "Biſhops themſelves, 1571, ordering that the ſaid "Lay-Chancellors ſhould not excommunicate in mat"ters of correction, and anno 1584 and 1589 not in "matters of inſtance, but to be done only by them, "who had the power of the keys (17)." He then deſired, that according to certain provincial conſtitutions, they of the Clergy might have meetings once every three weeks: firſt, in Rural Deaneries, and therein to have the liberty of propheſying, according as Archbiſhop Grindal and other Biſhops deſired of her late Majeſty. Secondly, that ſuch things, as could not be reſolved upon there, might be referred

(5) Ibid. p. 24, 25.
(6) Ibid. p. 37.
(7) Ibid. p. 38.
(8) Ibid. p. 43.
(9) Ibid. p. 44, 45.
(10) Ibid. p. 45.
(11) Ibid. p. 51.
(12) Ibid. p. 58, 59.
(13) Ibid. p. 63.
(14) Ibid. p. 68.
(15) Ibid. p. 75.
(16) Ibid. p. 76.
(17) Ibid. p. 77, 78.

RECKHEIM, an Earldom or County, Fief, immediate or ſovereign State of the Empire, has a ſeat, and a right of voting in the College of Princes, as well to the general as the circular diets. It is in the circle of Weſtphalia, and comprehends a town and ſeveral villages. Its ſoil is very fruitful, and moſt delightfully ſituated, in a beautiful and very populous country, on the banks of the Maeſe, two leagues from Maeſtricht, between the territories of Juliers, Liege, and Fauquemont. It has a right of toll on the Maeſe, and coins gold, ſilver, and copper money. The Caſtle, which is the Manſion Houſe of the Counts, is one of the fineſt, largeſt, and moſt magnificent in all Germany. Thoſe who poſſeſs it at this time are of the Houſe of Aſpermont (a). Linden, a moſt illuſtrious and moſt ancient houſe, are deſcended from the Counts of Aſpermont in Lorrain, whoſe Earldom conſiſted of near three hundred villages. We ſhall give hereunder ſome little account of their genealogy, and the preſent ſtate of the branch of the Counts of Reckheim [A].

(a) The French Authors write it Aſpremont, which is a corruption of the true orthography.

from thence to the Epiſcopal Synods, where the Biſhop with his Preſbyteri ſhould determine all ſuch points, as before could not be decided (18). Notwithſtanding our author's conduct at this conference, Dr. Simon Patrick obſerves (19), that he profeſſed himſelf a Conformiſt to the Church of England, and died ſo. He remarks, that Dr. Richard Crakanthorp tells (20) the Archbiſhop of Spalato, that the Doctor was no Puritan, (as the Archbiſhop called him) but he himſelf a Calumniator. "For firſt, he profeſſed, "that he appeared unwillingly in the cauſe at "Hampton-Court, and merely in obedience to the "King's command. And then he ſpoke not one "word there againſt the Hierarchy. Nay, he ac"knowledged it to be conſonant to the word of God "in his Conference with Hart. And in an anſwer "to Sanders's book of the Schiſm of England (which "is in the Archbiſhop's library) he profeſſes, that "he approves of the book of conſecrating and order"ing Biſhops, Prieſts, and Deacons. He was alſo a "ſtrict obſerver of all the orders of the Church and "Univerſity both in public and his own College; "wearing the ſquare cap and ſurplice, kneeling at "the Sacrament, and he himſelf commemorating "their benefactors at the times their Statutes ap"pointed, and reading that chapter of Eccleſiaſticus, "which is on ſuch occaſions uſed. In a letter alſo "of his to Archbiſhop Bancroft (then in Dr. Crak"anthorp's hands) he profeſſes himſelf conformable "to the Church of England, willingly and from his "heart, his conſcience admoniſhing him ſo to be. "And thus he remained perſuaded to his laſt breath, "deſiring to receive Abſolution according to the man"ner preſcribed in our Liturgy, when he lay on his "death-bed; which he did from Dr. Holland, the "King's Profeſſor in Oxford, kiſſing his hand in "token of his love and joy, and within a few hours "after reſigned up his ſoul to God." T.

(18) Ibid. p. 78, 79.

(19) Continuation of the Friendly Debate, part 2. p. 207. edit. 1684.

(20) Defenſio Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ, &c. c. 69. p. 419. ann. 1529.

[A] Some little account of their genealogy, and the preſent ſtate of the branch or family of Reckheim.] The firſt Count of Aſpermont was SIGISFRIDT, and lived in the year 660. He was deſcended from the family of the Princes of Eſte, in Italy. A younger brother of that family, ſprung from this Sigisfridt, and whoſe name was ARNOUL, came and ſetled in Holland in 1120, and there poſſeſſed the Lordſhip of Linden, which his deſcendants have enjoyed during a long courſe of years. One of them, HERMAN by name, purchaſed the Earldom of Reckheim, about the year 1550. He was General of the forces of Erneſt of Bavaria, Elector of Colen, and father of Erneſt, Count of Aſpermont, and of Reckheim, who was born in 1583; and was Chamberlain and Colonel to the Emperors Mathias and Ferdinand II. He married Anne Antoinette, daughter of Henry Marquis of Gouffier-Bonnivet, who brought him a ſon called FERDINAND. The laſt mentioned, born in 1611, married Elizabeth daughter of Egon, Count of Furſtemburg, and of Anna Maria Princeſs of Hohenzolleren, and who brought him four ſons and eight daughters, and theſe are as follow.

FRANCIS GOBERT Count of Reckheim, Biſhop of Cheur (1), and Canon of the Metropolitan Churches of Colen and Saltzburg, and of the Cathedral of Straſburg (2).

FERDINAND, General of the armies of his Imperial Majeſty, who, by his firſt wife, Charlotte daughter of Lewis George, Prince of Naſſau Dilemburg, and of Anna Auguſta Princeſs of Brunſwick, had but one daughter, viz. CHARLOTTE GOBERTINE, Canoneſs of Munſterbilſen, whoſe eight deſcents are Aſpermont-Reckheim, Gouffier, Furſtemburg, Hohenzolleren, Naſſau, Sayn, Brunſwick and Denmark. His ſecond wife was Juliana, daughter of Francis Rakoczi, Prince of Tranſylvania, and grand-daughter of George the younger, George the elder, and Sigiſmond, all Princes of Tranſylvania. He had a ſon by her named JOSEPH GOBERT.

CHARLES, Canon of the Metropolitan of Colen, and of the Cathedrals of Straſburg and Liege.

FREDERIC Great-croſs of the Order of Malta, and Commander of Tobel, Steinfort, and Munſter.

ANNA MARIA wife to Count Wenceſlaus of Althann, Counſellor of his Imperial Majeſty. Great Judge of Moravia, Governor of the Province of Glatz, and Ambaſſador extraordinary in Sweden and Poland.

ELEONORA Princeſs Abbeſs of Monſterbilſen.

ANNE SALOME wife of Lewis Count of Souches, Major-General of the armies of his Imperial Majeſty, and his Counſellor of State.

ERNESTINE, firſt married to John George Count de Collonitch, Chamberlain to his Imperial Majeſty; afterwards to Octavus Count of Curiani, the Emperor's Chamberlain and Counſellor of State.

ANNE ANTOINETTE wife of Claude Count of Tilly, Lieutenant General of the armies of the United Provinces.

MARIA FRANCIS wife of Charles Count of Aſpermont Linden, Counſellor of State of the territory of Liege, and Governor of the Marquiſate of Franchimont.

ALEXANDRINA and PETRONILLA, firſt Canoneſſes at Remiremont, and afterwards Urſeline Nuns at Metz.

The Counts of Aſpermont-Reckheim bear quarterly, in the 1ſt and 4th gules, with a croſs Or, which is Aſpermont-Linden in the 2d and 3d Or, with a lion gules, which is Reckheim; and over all azure, with an eagle argent, which is the ancient Aſpermont or Eſte (3).

(1) Or Choirs, the French write and pronounce Coirer. This Biſhoprick is in the country of the Griſons, and Suffragan to the Archbiſhop of Mentz. The Biſhop is in alliance with the Swiſs; notwithſtanding which, he has a vote and ſeat in the College of the Princes of the Empire. See Heiſs's Hiſtory of the Empire, Tom. 2. p. 265. Hague edit. of 1685.

(2) See the art. TILLI.

(3) Extracted from a Memoir communicated to the Author; which muſt likewiſe be underſtood of the text of this article.

REFUGE (DU), a French Gentleman, Author of a book, ſeveral editions of which have been publiſhed [A], and entitled, Traité de la Cour, ou Inſtruction des Courtiſans, i. e. "A treatiſe of the Court, or Inſtructions for Courtiers," was well verſed both in the theory and practice of affairs; he having read a vaſt number of books, and had an extenſive and long experience in Courts and the affairs of Kings, Princes, States, and Commonwealths,

[A] Author of a book ſeveral editions of which have been publiſhed.] The firſt was printed in Holland, and the ſecond in Paris. They were followed by that which was publiſhed at Paris in the year 1618, 8vo, after the author's death, and from his laſt corrections. This third edition is augmented and diſtinguiſhed by Commonwealths, in which the Kings of France had uſefully employed him; and in which he had ſo prudently and happily behaved, that they never made the leaſt objection to his wiſe conduct. He died in the reign of Lewis XIII. and there were found in his ſtudy, ſeveral manuſcripts relating to ſtate affairs, written by him, and of which his relations ſeemed to promiſe the publication. This is what we read in a ſmall Preface prefixed to the third edition of his treatiſe of the Court. This edition was printed at Paris in 1618.

(1) Extracted from the Advertiſement to the Reader, prefixed to the Paris edit. of 1618.

by Chapters with Summaries and Sections, but they left out the marginal notes and citations, with which the reſt had been curiouſly enriched (1). They reſtored them afterwards. I find them in the edition I make uſe of, which is that, for Stephen Loyſon, at Paris 1658, in 12mo. The author's name is publiſhed with it, and had been publiſhed before in that of Leyden 1649, in 12mo. It had not been inſerted in the edition of 1618, there being only, at the end of the book, the letters D. R after ſome verſes of Seneca which are not in the edition of 1658. There are a great number of very good things in this book. It was printed in Engliſh at London 1622, in 8vo.

REGIUS (URBAN), was one of the learned men in the 16th Century. He was born at Langenargen on the Lake of Conſtance, and having began his ſtudies at Lindaw, he continued them at Friburg, in Briſgaw, with ſo much the more advantage, as he lived with the famous Zazius, and was tenderly beloved by him [A]. He afterwards went and ſtudied in the Univerſity of Baſil, and then in that of Ingolſtad, in which city the fame of John Eccius drew a great number of ſcholars. He read private Lectures there; and ſhewed ſo much ability for inſtructing young people, that many Gentlemen truſted him with the whole conduct of their ſons, and even the direction of their whole expences. However, it was not poſſible for him to regulate the matter, thoſe young pupils run in debt with the vintners and ſhopkeepers (a); and as he was ſecurity for them, and their parents did not pay him, he became a kind of bankrupt. His creditors being very urgent with him, and he not having wherewith to pay, he endeavoured to eſcape; but ſome Captains coming to Ingolſtad at that time, to raiſe ſoldiers, he delivered up his books, clothes, &c. and enliſted himſelf. The new recruits being afterwards muſtered and reviewed, Profeſſor Eccius happening to be there, ſpied our Regius among the ſoldiers, when he went up to him, and being told the reaſon why he had enliſted himſelf, he promiſed to ſerve him, and was ſo zealous on that occaſion, that he reconciled him to the muſes; and threatened the ſcholars who had run in debt, to inform the Prince of them, if they did not pay him, and thereby free Regius, who continued to make ſo great a progreſs in the ſciences, that he received in Ingolſtad, from the hand of the Emperor Maximilian, the oratorial and poetical Crown. Some time after he was made Profeſſor of Rhetoric, and that of Poetry in the Univerſity of the above-mentioned city. He was in that quality, when in 1516 he wrote ſome letters (b) by the Duke of Bavaria's command, in order to engage Eraſmus to come to Ingolſtad; but theſe letters had not the deſired effect. Turning himſelf after to the ſtudy of divinity, he found it ſo engaging, that he applied himſelf entirely to it. He thereby imbibed ſome of Luther's principles, but was very much puzzled when Eccius his maſter and benefactor quarrelled with Luther. He at laſt reſolved to leave Ingolſtad, and retire to Auſburg, where he was of great ſervice againſt Popery. He there founded a Proteſtant Church, and from thence ſpread what were called the new opinions. He was a Zuinglian for ſome time, but afterwards declared himſelf a zealous Lutheran [B]. Eccius, who went to viſit him at Auſburg, and had a conference with him, in order to bring him back to the Church of Rome,

(a) Modum in veſtitu & victu ubique excedere. Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. p. 22.

(b) See the 17th and 8th Letters, of book 2. among thoſe of Eraſmus. Eraſmus thanked and applauded him. See Letter 19. of book 2. and the 35th of 18.

[A] He lived with the famous Zazius, and was tenderly beloved by him (1).] He choſe out, in Zazius's library, all ſuch books as he imagined proper for the improvement of his ſtudies, and copied all the marginal notes written by that learned Profeſſor upon them. In this manner our young ſtudent uſed to ſpend a conſiderable part of the night. Zazius, who ſlept but little, and uſed to riſe ſometimes to walk about, in order to cheer himſelf for his want of ſleep, catched him copying theſe notes, and ſaid to him in a kind and loving manner, you are plundering me of the fruits of my Lucubrations. Lucubrantem invenit in deſcribendis illis ſcholiis, Urbanum: cujus auriculam Zaſius blandiuſculè vellicans, arte & ſcientia ſua ſe ab ipſo defraudari jocatus eſt (2). He ſometimes found him aſleep, on which occaſion he only laid ſome huge volumes on his ſhoulders till he was awake. Aut ſi quando ſomno ad candelam oppreſſum & inclinato in menſam capite dormitantem offendiſſet: juris volumen grande unum atque alterum humeris impoſitum reliquit, donec excitaretur (3). I relate theſe little circumſtances, becauſe I know many worthy perſons are delighted to hear of ſuch marks, either of the kindneſs of a profeſſor, or the diligence of a pupil.

(1) Amavit eum Zazius ut filium. Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. p. 71.

(2) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. p. 71.

(3) Idem, ibid.

[B] He was a Zuinglian for ſome time, but afterwards declared himſelf a zealous Lutheran.] Zuinglius wrote to him as follows in 1526. In Euchariſtiæ re gratulor vobis, te noſtrum eſſe factum. Verum gratiam meretur novitas: brevi enim ſpero omnes qui adhuc obſtrepunt tropum, qui nullo negotio videri vobis debebat, viſuros eſſe ac ſententiæ noſtræ ſimplicitatem ac claritatem (4). i. e. "I congratulate you for being of "the ſame opinion with me concerning the Euchariſt. The novelty of the thing alſo deſerves my "thanks: for I hope, that all who inveigh ſo much "againſt the figure, which you muſt have eaſily com"prehended, will ſoon perceive how ſimple and "clear our opinion is." They diſcourſed together on original ſin the ſame year, and we have ſeen the letter (5) which Zuinglius wrote to Regius concerning this article. Luther was not ignorant of the conformity of opinions of theſe two perſons, and was extremely ſorry on that account. Dolet mihi valde nobiliſſimum virum Oecolampadium tam ludicris & nihili cogitationibus in hoc barathrum prolapſum; pulſat eum Sathanas: Dominus eripiat eum. Urbanus Regius in idem malum vel inclinat, vel jam cecidit: Dominus ſervet ſuos (6). i. e. "I am very much grieved that ſo "illuſtrious a man as Oecolampadius ſhould have "fallen into this pit, by ſuch filly, trifling thoughts. "Satan is buſy about him; may God reſcue him out "of his hands. Urban Regius is either included or "already fallen into the ſame evil; may the Lord "preſerve his own people." Luther tells him, in another letter, that he had heard that Regius was going to write againſt him. Præterea Urbanus Regius minari

(4) Zuinglius, Epiſt. lib. 1. p. 82. apud Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. p. 73.

(5) p. 251 of Zuinglius's Letters.

(6) Luther. Tom. 2. Epiſt. p. 326. anno 1527. apud Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. p. 73.

Rome, had no ſucceſs on that occaſion. A paper war even broke out between them, and Regius carried it on with vigour, though his antagoniſt might have reproached him with ingratitude. The Proteſtants had not always the ſuperiority in Auſburg, there being a time in which Regius was obliged to leave that city, and hide himſelf in many places; however, he afterwards was glorioufly recalled, and married into a good family of Auſburg. There was ſomething very ſingular in the diſpute he had with a female Anabaptiſt [C]. He lived in that city till the time the diet was held there in 1530, when he entered into the ſervice of the Duke of Brunſwick, who made him ſuperintendant of the Churches minari dicitur in me ſcripta, ſcilicet Oecolampadium & Zwinglium tantos viros (ut ſentit) non vult offendere: ſic mutatus eſt ab illo (7). i. e. "It is farther ſaid "that Urban Regius threatens to write againſt me; "he being not willing to render himſelf obnoxious "to Oecolampadius and Zwinglius, thoſe great men, "as he is pleaſed to term them; ſo greatly is he "changed from what he was." By this we find that Regius had appeared at firſt what he appeared at laſt, I mean a good Lutheran. He quitted the principles of Zuinglius as early as the year 1528. See the letter (8) in which Luther declares his joy on that occaſion, and recommends him to the Marquis of Brandenburg. The converſation he had with Regius at Coburg in 1530, had a very happy effect; Regius, at the ending of it, highly admired Luther, which he himſelf declares in a letter. Cum Saxoniam peterem Coburgi integrum diem ſolus cum Luthero, viro Dei, tranſegeram: quo die nullus mihi in vita fuit jucundior. Talis enim ac tantus Theologus Lutherus, ut nulla ſecula habuerint ſimilem. Hoc magis execror ſtultitiam & arrogantiam Caroloſtadianorum, qui ſibi placent, quaſi Luthero queant conferri, cujus umbram non aſſequuntur, cum omni eruditione quam jactant. Semper mihi magnus fuit Lutherus: at jam mihi maximus eſt. Vidi enim præſens & audivi, quæ nullo calamo tradi poſſunt abſentibus (9). i. e. "When I was travelling "to Saxony, I paſſed a whole day, at Coburg, with "no other perſon but Luther, that man of God; "and no day in my life was ſpent more agreeably. "Luther is ſuch and ſo great a Divine, that no age "ever produced his parallel. This makes me deteſt "the folly and arrogance of the Caroloſtadians, "who flatter themſelves, as if they were wor"thy of being compared to Luther, though they "are not even his ſhadow, notwithſtanding all the "learning they boaſt. I always conſidered Luther "as a great man, but I now think him greater than "ever. I ſaw and heard ſuch things, when we were "together, as cannot be deſcribed by any pen." Luther, on the other hand, was extremely well ſatisfied with this converſation; and vaſtly well ſatisfied with the learning he found in Regius, whoſe converſion he conſidered as a piece of news very worthy of being made publick. He wrote as follows to Wenceſlaus Lincus, Urbanum Regium quoque reſipuiſſe, credo te noſſe, & contra hoſtes Sacramentarios ſtrenue nobiſcum certare (10). i. e. "I do not doubt but you "have heard of Urban Regius's repentance and con"verſion, and of his engaging valiantly with us, a"gainſt the Sacramentarians."

(7) Idem, Luther. ibid. p. 330. apud Melch. Adam. ibid.

(8) It is in Seckendorf, Hiſt. Luther. lib. 2. p. 122. num. 5.

(9) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. p. 78.

(10) Luther. Tom. 2. Epiſt. p. 311. apud Melch. Adam. ibid. p. 78.

[C] There was ſomething very ſingular in the diſpute he had with a female Anabaptiſt.] The Magiſtrates of Auſburg put in force, againſt the Anabaptiſts, the civil laws by which the Sectariſts are forbid to hold conventicles, and to exerciſe their Religions; they ſent them into baniſhment, or impriſoned them. Now a woman of a good family boaſting, when in priſon, that if ſhe had a conference with Regius, ſhe would ſhew him the truth and excellency of the Anabaptiſt principles, ſhe therefore was ſent for, to diſpute with him in full Senate. Accordingly ſhe was brought thither with all the equipage of a priſoner, that is, with chains both on her hands and feet; whilſt Regius ſeated himſelf among the Senators. She alledged a numberleſs multitude of paſſages of Scripture, which ſhe applied to the beſt of her power, in defenſe of her opinions. Regius anſwered her, and ſhewed very evidently the true ſenſe of thoſe paſſages. However, he was not able to convert her, ſhe perſiſting in her errors, and addreſſed the Proteſtant Miniſters in manner following. This, brother Urban, is a ſtrange way of diſputing. You, ſeated on a ſoft chair with the Burgomaſters by your ſide, ſpeak like an oracle, and you pronounce decrees as from Apollo's tripod; whilſt I, proſtrate on the ground, am forced to plead my cauſe with chains on my feet. Siſter, replied Regius, you deſerve this, ſince as you have been delivered from the ſlavery of the devil, by Chriſt Jeſus, you have voluntarily ſubmitted yourſelf to an infamous yoke. A mad ſpirit ſhews you, with all theſe accoutrements of a captive, as an example to others. The reſult of this affair was, that the woman was baniſhed from the city (11). If the reader is diffident with regard to the juſtneſs of my verſion, let him read what follows. Ipſa tantùm abeſt, ut monitis locum dederit: ut pervicaciter etiam Urbanum hiſce fuerit adorta: Egregia enim verò, Urbane frater, hæc diſputandi ratio eſt inter me & te. Tu in molli culcitra ad latera Conſulum adſidens, quaſi ex Apollinis tripode proloqueris: ego miſera humi proſtrata, ex duris vinculis cauſam dicere cogor. Ad hæc Urbanus: Nec verò, inquit, injuria, ſoror: ut quæ ſemel è ſervitute diaboli per Chriſtum in libertatem adſerta, tua ſponte iterum cervicem turpi jugo ſubmiſiſti; & iſtis te ornamentis veſanus oſtentat genius, aliis in exemplum. Senatus itaque, cùm laterem ſe lavare videret; contagium illud exilio mulctavit, urbeque expulit (12).

(11) Melch. Adam. ibid. p. 731.

(12) Idem, ibid.

This woman did not want ſenſe. She made a very judicious reflection and enlivened it with great ſmartneſs; but then ſhe had too much confidence, or rather was very raſh. She imagined, that appearing in the diſgraceful garb of a criminal, with a Miniſter of the eſtabliſhed Religion, and in preſence of Judges who had before condemned the principles of the Anabaptiſts, and impriſoned thoſe who inculcated them, ſhe ſhould perſuade the audience of the juſtneſs of her cauſe. However in order for a perſon to promiſe himſelf this, it is not ſufficient for him to have juſtice on his ſide, but he alſo muſt hope for an extraordinary aſſiſtance from the ſpirit of God; for, according to the uſual courſe of things, we do not find that a perſon impriſoned for the ſake of Religion, can confound adverſaries who ſpeak to him from an eminence; and who have, on their ſide, the pomp of outſide, not to mention that the audience are prejudiced in their favour. I am ſenſible that the cauſe which this woman defended was not a good one; but it is my opinion, that, though ſhe had maintained a doctrine as good, or even better, than that of Regius, ſhe would have been defeated, in the circumſtances to which the controverſy was reduced. The parties were not fairly matched, and the arms no ways equal. Regius was honourably ſeated, and ſurrounded with all the inſignia of favour; not to mention that he undertook the defenſe of a cauſe which the ſovereign had embraced, and againſt a cauſe which the ſovereign perſecuted. His antagoniſt was a woman loaded with chains, and in the poſture of a criminal who was already condemned. A very ſolid reaſon from her, would not have counterbalanced an indifferent one alledged by Regius, with all the weight and emphaſis of a man who is ſeated among the Burgomaſters, and on a kind of tribunal. Shall I quote Euripides, who declares that the words of a man in favour are more powerful than if uttered by an unhappy wretch?

Τὸ δ' ἀξίωμα κἂν κακῶς λέγῃ τὸ σὸν,
Πείσει· λόγῳ γὰρ ἔκ τ' ἀδοξούντων ἰὼν,
Κἀκ τῶν δοκούντων αὐτὸς, οὐ ταυτὸν θάνει (13).

That is, according to Ennius's verſion (14).

Hæc tu etſi perversè dices, facile Achivos flexeris.
Nam quum opulenti loquuntur pariter atque ignobiles,
Eadem dicta, eademque oratio æqua non æque valet.

(13) Hecuba ad Ulyſſem, apud Euripidem in Hecuba, ver. 293. p. m. 20.

(14) Aulum Gellium, lib. 11. cap. 4. p. m. 286.

" How

Churches in the territory of Lunenburg, and had an extraordinary eſteem for him [D]. He exerciſed his talents in favour of the cauſe, in ſeveral ſynods, and wrote ſeveral books [E]. He died at Zell in May 1541, in the manner he had often deſired to be taken out of the world [F], that is, almoſt ſuddenly (c). I muſt not forget that his wife was very well ſkilled in the Hebrew tongue (d). I muſt obſerve that he publiſhed a converſation he had with her, on the characters of the Meſſias applied to Jeſus Chriſt. She brought him thirteen children (e). I ſhall make a remark on the names of this Proteſtant Miniſter [G].

(c) Extracted from Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. p. 70 & ſeq.

(d) Micrælius, in Syntagm. Hiſt. Eccleſ. p. m. 778.

(e) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. p. 74.

No

" How wrong ſoe'er you ſpeak, you ſtill will tri" umph ;
" For the ſame words, by rich and poor pronounc'd,
" Strike widely different on the hearer's ear."

Shall I quote the following verſes of Plautus ?

Centum doctum hominum conſilia ſola hæc devincit dea, Fortuna, atque hoc verum'ſt proinde ut quiſque fortuna utitur,
Ita præcellet, atque exinde ſapere eum omnes dicimus (15).

(15) Plautus in Pſeudolo, act. 2. ſcen. 3. ver. 12.

" Fortune, fantaſtic goddeſs, has alone
" More power and weight, than the united counſels
" Of ev'n an hundred ſages. And this is true,
" That as a man is ſmil'd upon by fortune,
" He's thought in all things to excel ; and thence
" The world conclude him to be fraught with
" wiſdom."

Shall I quote the following words of the younger Pliny ? Quam multum intereſt, quid à quoque fiat, eadem enim facta claritate vel obſcuritate facientium, aut tolluntur altiſſime, aut humillime deprimuntur (16). i. e. " It " is of great importance who the perſon is by whom " an action is performed ; for the ſame action ſhall " be greatly applauded, or very much diſcommend- " ed, according to the reputation or obſcurity of " thoſe by whom they are performed." Shall I produce an hundred more authorities of the ſame weight ? I will not, but will leave all theſe vulgar topicks, and ſhall only obſerve one thing that may ſeem relative to my ſubject. Had Regius diſputed at Ingolſtad with a Romiſh Prieſt, in quite different circumſtances from the diſpute at Auſburg, himſelf in chains, &c. and the Prieſt on a cuſhion in the midſt of the Senators, this controverſy would have ended either in his baniſhment or ſomething worſe. He would have been reputed a caviller, who wreſted the ſenſe of the Scriptures, and the Prieſt would have been conſidered as the faithful interpreter of the divine original.

(16) Plin. Epiſt. 24. lib. 6.

[D] The Duke of Brunſwick . . . . had an extraordinary eſteem for him.] Being aſked whether, in imitation of other Princes, he had purchaſed any thing of very great value, and in a new faſhion, he replied, I have brought an ineſtimable treaſure, and which will be of ſervice to all my territories, and which I prefer to delights of every kind (17). He meant Regius ; and when the city of Auſburg, in 1535, requeſted him to reſtore them that divine, he declared that he would as ſoon part with his eyes (18). He ſettled conſiderable penſions upon him, and gave him the ſuperintendency of all the Churches in his territories (19).

(17) Allatum eſſe à ſe theſaurum toti ducatui incomparabilem quem omnibus anteponat deliciis. Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. p. 78.

(18) Perinde ut oculos ita & Urbanum ſe amittere nolle. Idem, ib.

(19) Idem, ibid. and p. 79.

[E] He wrote ſeveral books.] They are collected into three volumes, the two firſt of which contain the pieces he publiſhed in Latin ; and the other, his German compoſitions (20). This laſt volume, if I miſtake not, has been tranſlated into Latin ; I finding, in the Bodleian catalogue, Vita & Opera (Urbani Regii) Latine reddita per Erneſt. Regium. Norib. 1562. Melchior Adamus obſerves that ERNEST REGIUS, the Author's ſon, collected all theſe compoſitions, and publiſhed them, divided into a certain number of tomes, at Nuremberg. He makes particular mention of the book in which our Urban had collected the harſh phraſes, and ſuch as are accurate. The former are fit for nothing but to create diviſions, but the latter may be conducive to piety and concord. He undertook this collection at the command of Prince Erneſt of Brunſwick, and it was an inſtance of his piety and wiſdom ; for too rough and poignant expreſſions are like the teeth of Cadmus's dragon, a ſeed of war among brethren. This is Melchior Adamus's reflection (21). Exſtat inter alia liber ejus, in quo annotatæ ſunt horridiores formæ loquendi : & monſtrantur propriæ ac concinnæ, utiles pietati ac concordiæ. Has admonitiones ſcribi princeps Erneſtus Lunæburgicus voluit : qua in re ſapientiam & pietatem ejus agnoſcimus. Ut enim ex dentibus draconis, in Cadmæa hiſtoria, nata eſt ſoboles armatorum inter ſe dimicantium : ſic ex improprio ſermone diſſidia opinionum in docentibus & in populo naſcuntur. This reflection does not occur to the compoſers of formularies, when theſe have more devotion than judgment ; or have more paſſion and vain glory than true devotion. They are abſolute ſtrangers to whatever has the appearance of prudence and moderation, and pride themſelves in ſeverity (22). It is to be obſerved that John Freder of Pomerania publiſhed, after the Author's death, a work of Regius entitled, Loci Theologici ex patribus & ſcholaſticis neotericiſque collecti (23).

(21) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. p. 79, 80.

(22) But obſerve, that general terms, and thoſe which are uſed out of condeſcenſion, are ſometimes uſeleſs. See the rem. [G] of the art. MUSCULUS.

(23) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. p. 80.

[F] He died . . . in the manner he had deſired to be taken out of the world.] He was ſick but three hours, and he had always wiſhed not to die of a lingering ſickneſs (24). Nactus eſt genus mortis, quale ſæpè in votis habuit, citum & placidum ; cum ſemper deprecaretur diuturnos languores & longas morborum periodos (25). He is not the only perſon who deſired ſuch an end, and was gratified in his wiſhes (26).

(24) Idem, p. 79.

(25) Idem, ibid.

[G] I ſhall make a remark on the names of this Proteſtant Miniſter.] The name of his family was Roi (King) ; but thinking it too exalted, and that it afforded too much matter for joking, he changed it into that of Regius (27). With regard to the name Urban, it was given him at his baptiſm, becauſe the women, who preſented him to the pariſh Prieſt, had forgot the name the mother had told them. The good woman would have the child bear the name of that Saint, whoſe name was in the Calendar on that day on which he was born ; but the women in queſtion forgetting it by the way, and the Prieſt finding them heſitate about it, told them that St. Urban's day was at hand, upon which the child was chriſtened Urban. I obſerve by the way that, among all nations, a great many families bear the name of a dignity, as King, Prince, Duke, Marquis, Count, Baron &c. They do not think of changing them, though it gives frequent occaſion to jokes and childiſh alluſions. However, I believe that our Lutheran Doctor is not the only perſon, who, to avoid this inconveniency, diſguiſed his name. We every where meet with people whoſe names are Regis or Regius : a diſguiſed name, if I miſtake not, for the ſame reaſon. I have ſaid elſewhere (28), that I was ſurprized that ſuch families as have a ridiculous or odious name do not change them ; and I add here, that ſome who formerly had an obſcene name are no longer called by it now. Read the following paſſage from Menage (29) : HAUTECLAIR, " the name of a family. " This name was given in the reign of Henry II. " to a Maſter of the Requeſts, whoſe name was Couil- " lard, upon a pleaſant occaſion. This Maſter of " the Requeſts uſed to go frequently to the Louvre. " One day as he was tapping gently at the door of " the King's or Queen's cloſet, the gentlemen uſhers " aſked him his name, but he did not dare to tell it " diſtinctly, becauſe of its obſcenity. The gentle- " men uſhers not underſtanding, or feigning not to " do it, bid him ſpeak his name haut & clair (loud " and clear) which gave occaſion to his being cal- " led Hauteclair. I was told this ſtory by Mr. du " Puy, who was informed of it by Thuanus, who " in the VIIIth book of his hiſtory, pag. 262 of the " Geneva edition, mentions his changing his name, " but occaſionally. Negotium datum P. Altoclaro, Li- " bellorum Supplicum Magiſtro, qui pudendo alio cogno- " mine indigetabatur, ut negotium Regium, &c." He had ſaid in the firſt edition of his Origines, that the

(26) See the art. VALLA (George).

(27) Majores ejus Regum cognomine inſignes fuerunt : ſed cum id ſublime & jocis aptum ex Rege regius factus eſt, ut ipſe dictitare ſolitus. Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. p. 70.

(28) Rem. [A] of the art. FEUARDENT.

(29) Menage, Origines de la Langue Françoiſe, p. 395. edit. 1694.

No perſon can doubt, after he has well examined ſeveral paſſages (f) in his books, that he is for having prayers offered up for the dead.

(f) They are in the Calvino-Turciſmus, book 4. chap. 8. p. m. 140 & ſeq.

Beauharnois of Orleans alſo changed their name Beauvit, becauſe of its obſcenity, to that of Beauharnois; but it is declared in the ſecond edition that this is a fiction.

I foreſee that thoſe, who ſhall call to mind a remark of de Vigneul Marville, in reading what I ſaid in the Article of Feuardent the Franciſcan, will object to me, that I ought not to be ſurprized at people's not quitting ſirnames of an odious or ridiculous kind. They will aſſert that men are not allowed that liberty, and alledge the following paſſage from the Melange d'Hiſtoire & de Litterature (30): With regard to what Mr. de la Roque ſays, that, ever ſince the ordinance of Amboiſe, dated the 26th of March 1555, no one is allowed to change his name without the expreſs leave of the Sovereign: it muſt be obſerved, that long before this ordinance, no perſon was allowed to change his name without having an authority for it. This is inſtanced in the barber of Lewis XI. and the very words of the Letters patents of this Prince are quoted, by which he wills and ordains that Oliver le Mauvais, (this was his barber's name) [Le Mauvais, or, as it was anciently ſpelt, Ly Mauſtez, or le mal faiſant (evil doer) is one of the words ſynonymous with devil, as the man is called in ſeveral books of that age. Lewis XI made him change this ſirname which was too viſibly odious, into that of Dain, and that perhaps out of a malicious complaiſance for a perſon of this ſtamp, who, with all his cunning, was ſo ſtupid as not to know, that in the uſual forms of ſpeaking, le Dain and le Dannée were alſo ſynonymous, or ſomething like it (α).] that this le Mauvais, I ſay, and his poſterity, ſhould henceforward bear the ſirname of le Dain . . . and that it ſhall not be lawful for any perſon to give him any more the ſirname of Mauvais; which name we have taken away and aboliſhed, and by theſe preſents, do take away and aboliſh. Theſe letters are dated in October 1474, and were regiſtered in the Parliament of Paris the 30th of January 1474 (31). If thoſe who would raiſe this objection imagine it to be ſolid, they know not how to form a right judgment of things. I anſwer as follows. I ſay, I. that my expreſſion ought to be taken in the ſame ſenſe with the following; I am ſurprized that debauchees are not afraid of the injury they do to their health and reputation. This is ſpeaking in the preſent tenſe, and yet, it regards as much paſt ages as that in which a writer makes ſuch a reflection; and thus, the manner in which I expreſſed myſelf, to denote my ſurprize, that people do not quit ſuch names as are of a ridiculous or odious kind, relates no leſs to the time which preceded the age when this ordinance publiſhed by Mr. de la Roque (32) is dated, than the times that followed it. Now it is certain that, before the date of the ordinance, ſome people laid aſide their names, or changed and diſguiſed them. Mr. de la Roque (33) cites Mr. Menage, who ſays, that William le Rat, diſpleaſed, as one may ſuppoſe, at his bearing the name of an ugly animal, gave himſelf the ſirname of Leſrat; and that John Dorat, Regius profeſſor of the Greek tongue, changed his name Diſnemandy . . . the ancient name of his family, to that of Dorat or Daurat. It would be abſurd to ſuppoſe that they obtained this permiſſion from the King; de Vigneul Marville does not ſay ſo. I will ſuppoſe, ſays he (34), that before the ordinance of Amboiſe, ſeveral perſons took upon themſelves to change their names, without having recourſe to the Sovereign; and that poſſibly the phyſician named Sanſmalice, might have changed this name into that of Akakia without taking a patent from Francis I; but then it was only the tranſlation of a French word into a Greek one. Here we have the ſame Author that is objected to me, who himſelf acknowledges, that people changed their names notwithſtanding the patent of Lewis XI, and indeed we ought to ſuppoſe, that it was granted to his barber, not that he might be permitted to change the name of his family, but only that people might not continue to call him by that name. This man was greatly hated in France; and conſequently his enemies would have been pleaſed to croſs the deſign he had of getting rid of a name he was aſhamed of. Such was the motive of the patent. It conſequently was no rule with regard to an hundred other caſes, in which the public was wholly unconcerned. Now if, upon pretence of a Greek tranſlation, a perſon might, without any danger, ſubſtitute the name Akakia, for that of Sans-malice; much more might it be permitted to ſubſtitute one name for another, when the difference between them conſiſted only in the inſertion, the tranſpoſition, or ſuppreſſion of ſome letters. I ſay II. that experience argues for me, becauſe a great many famous authors have taken up a new name, without any authority from their Prince (35). III. I add, that it is plain that the ordinance of the 26th of March, before Eaſter of the year 1555, was deſigned only to prevent the uſurpations of ſuch as might aſſume nobility to themſelves, or ſome other fraud; ſo that whenever a man had no other deſign than that of Regius, he was not reſtrained by this ordinance. IV. I likewiſe ſay, that in all probability it was not better obſerved than that of the States of Blois, of the year 1579, which forbid all Gentlemen from ſigning in acts and contracts, any names, except that of their family, upon the penalty of being made void . . . . . This article had not all the wiſhed-for effect: for many perſons, inſtead of obſerving it, directly infringed it, which I obſerved, adds Mr. de la Roque, in authentic and public inſtruments (36). V. I anſwer laſtly, that if the ordinance of Amboiſe was well obſerved, one might nevertheleſs wonder that perſons, who have ridiculous or odious names, do not lay them aſide; for the Sovereign will grant that leave to all who ſue for it (37); and we find among other inſtances, in Mr. de la Roque's book, that James Miette (Crumb) (which is a low and groveling name and ſuch as may give a handle to many ſilly jeſts) had a patent from Henry IV. dated in March 1603 . . . by which he was authorized to quit his name, and aſſume that of Lauberie (38). See the Bigarrures of des Accords, Book IV, Chap. II; and Baillet, Auteurs Déguiſez, Chap. V. and VI. We are told, in the Menagiana, that Father Commire's name was Commere.

(α) Rem. Crit.

(30) Vigneul Marville, Melange, Tom. 1. p. 259. 1ſt edit. of Roan.

(31) Had Vigneul Marville called to mind that the year then began at Eaſter, he would not have ſaid, Melanges, Tom. 1. p. 260. that there is an error in the date; becauſe thoſe letters dated in Octob. 1474, could not be regiſtered till the following year.

(32) Gilles Andrew de la Roque, Sieur of the Lontiere, in his treatiſe Of the Origin of Names, p. 182.

(33) Ibid. p. 96.

(34) Vigneul Marville, Melange, Tom. 1. p. 260.

(35) See the oration of Majoragius, cited in the rem. [E], of his article. See alſo the art. PAREUS (David), rem. [A].

(36) La Roque, Traite de l'origine des Noms, p. 100.

(37) Idem, ibid. p. 182.

(38) Idem, ibid.

REIHING (JAMES), Profeſſor of Divinity at Tubingen, was born in 1579 at Auſburg, and one of the ancient families called Patrician. He was ſent to Ingolſtad to purſue his ſtudies, and made ſuch a progreſs as gave great pleaſure to his maſters (a). When he was come to the age, in which the ancient Romans put on the Toga virilis, he made a vow to put on the Jeſuit's habit, in caſe he recovered from a dangerous indiſpoſition with which he was afflicted; and having recovered, he fulfilled his vow, notwithſtanding the oppoſition made by his mother (b). He went through his noviciat at Landſberg (c), and afterwards made a very great figure in the ſociety. He taught the claſſics at Inſpruck, and philoſophy and divinity at Ingolſtad; and diſcharged theſe functions ſo well, that he was thought worthy of a Doctor's Degree in Divinity by Aquaviva the General, and accordingly was admitted to it at Dillingen (d). From that time he found himſelf fired with a ſtronger zeal for the defenſe of the Romiſh Communion; on which account he was appointed by his ſuperiors aulick preacher to Wolfgang William

(a) He ſtudied in the Jeſuit's College.

(b) Extracted from Spizelius, in Templo Honoris reſerato, p. 93, 94.

(c) Rauſcherus, in Laud. funebri Reihingi, apud Witte, Memor. Theolog. p. 897.

(d) Idem, ibid. p. 898.

William Duke of Newburg, who had lately left the Proteſtant Religion [A], and who ordered him to write againſt that religion. He thought of nothing day and night but for arguments that might utterly deſtroy the confeſſion of the Lutherans; but as his adverſaries combated him perpetually with the holy Scriptures, he found himſelf obliged to conſult that divine book and to keep to it; to draw from thence, if poſſible, the arms which were neceſſary for him in that combat. He found, by this ſtudy, that he was engaged in the defenſe of a bad cauſe; upon which he left his employment, and retired to the Court of Wirtemberg [B], where he embraced the Lutheran Religion. He was made Profeſſor of Divinity in Tubingen, preacher in ordinary, and director of a College. He diſcharged all theſe functions with great applauſe, and wrote ſome books which met with a favourable reception. The Jeſuits made him the fineſt promiſes, and employed all the alluring arts poſſible to bring him back again [C]; but all to no purpoſe, he deſpiſing

[A] The Duke of Newburg, who had lately left the Proteſtant Religion.] Martin Rauſcherus, who made Reihing's funeral oration, ſays nothing that leads us to believe that this Jeſuit contributed to make the Duke of Newburg change his Religion. Theophilus Spizelius (1), and father Alegambe (2) have been equally ſilent on that head. They all three content themſelves with ſaying, that a little after this Prince had changed his Religion, father Reihing was appointed his Preacher. Some authors nevertheleſs affirm that to this Jeſuit wholly was owing the Duke of Newburg's converſion, and that he won him by worldly views. Here follow the words of a Journaliſt, in the extract of one of Leti's works (3): "The Princes of the houſe of Newburg were formerly Proteſtants; but a Jeſuit, James Reyhing by "name, found means to make one of them change "his Religion by ſome pretty good political reaſons "*, which may be ſeen in the author. But a ſurprizing circumſtance is, the converter himſelf afterwards embraced the Proteſtant Religion to repair "in ſome meaſure for the breach he had made in "it, by diſengaging the Duke of Newburg from its "body. Abbot Pacichelli, and Baccati, Secretary to "the then Pope's Nuncio at Colen, cited by the author, aſcribe this change to a hidden judgment of "God, à un occulto giudicio de Dio; but it is not very "difficult for Proteſtants to conceive, that a man who "ſtudies controverſy may change his opinions, and "finds that the Proteſtants are in the right; in like "manner as a Prince, who was a Proteſtant, turns "Roman-Catholic from ſelf-intereſted views. The "one is not more miraculous than the other; and "there is no reaſon to ſay on this occaſion, as one "of the characters in la Filli di Sciro:

"Le vie de gli Dei
"Sono oſcure & ritorte
"Ch'il crederebbe? in ſomma
"E il cielo un Laberinto, in cui ſi perde
"Chiunque va per iſpiarne i fati."

"The way of God is dark and intricate,
"Surprizing thought! . . . For heaven's a labyrinth,
"Where every man who ſtrives to trace its paths
"In endleſs error's puzzled and bewilder'd."

(1) In Elogio Reibingii, in Templo Honoris reſerato.

(2) In Bibl. Script. Societ. p. 209.

(3) Bibl. Univ. Tom. 14. p. 24. in the extract of part 2. of Ritratti Hiſtorici, overo Hiſtoria dell' Imperio Romano in Germania, ſcritta da Gregorio Leti.

* p. 162.

[B] He retired to the Court of Wirtemburg.] Spizelius has been guilty of a great omiſſion on this occaſion, he not ſpecifying the year when he withdrew. This fault has not been committed in our Reihing's funeral oration; but the printers of de Witte's work falſified that date ſo much, that it is of no uſe to me. They ſay that Reihing, having fled from the Duke of Newburg's Court, arrived at that of Wirtemberg the beginning of the year 1601 (4). They doubtleſs forgot vigeſimi; for I learn from another author (5), that he retired ſecretly from the Duke of Newburg's the 5th of January 1620; and that he went to Hochſtett to that Prince's mother, whence he went to Ulm, afterwards to Stutgard, and laſtly to Tubingen, where he abjured Popery, and preached on the motives of his converſion, the 2d of January 1621, There appears to me ſome confuſion here, when I compare the relation of Paul Freherus with that of Rauſcherus; for, according to the latter, the new-comer was examined, during a fortnight, and afterwards ſent to Tubingen, where his name was regiſtered in the book of the Rector of the Univerſity. If he arrived at Stutgard in the beginning of January, and there underwent an examination during a week, before he went to Tubingen, as Rauſcherus affirms, he did not preach at Tubingen, on the motives of his converſion, the 2d of January, as Freherus affirms. I believe there are two typographical errors in Freherus's relation; and that, to rectify them, we muſt ſay that Reihing left the Duke of Newburg's Court the 5th of January 1621, and that he preached in Tubingen the 22d of January of the ſame year. The reader muſt not wonder to hear of his being obliged to undergo ſo long an examination. The Proteſtants are extremely miſtruſtful of a Jeſuit; and the condition they were then in in Germany, made ſuch a ſuſpicion neceſſary. Beſides, it is very rare to ſee a Jeſuit of reputation quit his order to turn Proteſtant; for this reaſon ſuch a ſingular thing is conſidered as a kind of prodigy, and ought to be carefully examined, in order to ſee whether it be a good omen, or the forerunner of ſome evil. The Duke of Wirtemberg hearing that father Reihing was come, in order to change his Religion, aſſembled his Divines, and ordered them to examine him very ſtrictly. They perſonated Roman-Catholicks; and propoſed to this father, during a week, the difficulties which are objected to the Proteſtants. He made ſuch an anſwer on that occaſion, as proved that he had compared the two Religions with great care and attention. Juro vobis Auditores: toto illo, quo res ſeriò utrinque acta eſt, octiduo, ea in omnibus, & quidem cardinalibus fidei noſtræ articulis deprompſit & exhibuit fundamenta, ut neminem non in admirationem ſui converteret: Sacræ etiam Scripturæ teſtimonia, quibus noſtrorum ſententia firmari ſolet, ita in numerato habebat, ita illi præcipui textus erant in mundo (6), ac ſi totam ætatem in ſcholis noſtris inſumpſiſſet. Quæ profectò non rudem & novitium, ſed aliquem in hac militia veteranum arguebant (7). After he had undergone this trial, he was judged worthy of being adopted; and he was addreſſed in the words which Priam addreſſed to Sinon (8). Soluto conventu lætum ex aula carmen accipit.

Quiſquis es, amiſſos hinc jam obliviſcere Grajos:
Noſter eris (9).

"The meeting being broke up, the Court compli"mented him with the joyful ſong following.

"Diſmiſs thy fears,
"Forget the Greeks, be mine as thou wert theirs.
DRYDEN.

[C] The Jeſuits made him the fineſt promiſes, and employed all the alluring arts poſſible to bring him back again.] The more the Proteſtants boaſted the converſion of ſo famous a man, the more grieved the Jeſuits were for having loſt him. He had gained the eſteem of the Society by his good life, his eloquence and erudition (10); for which reaſon his converſion was a great grief to the whole order, and a thouſand methods were employed to bring him back again. Father Keller promiſed him all the advantages he could poſſibly deſire; with full liberty, either to return to the Jeſuits, to be a Canon, or to lead a ſecular life. They gave him a carte blanche, and aſſured him that his ſuperiors ſhould ratify all the promiſes he ſhould make to him. Quam lautus ille (Kellerus) fecit pollicitationes? quam pingues conditiones & propter quas vel vadimonium deſeri poſſet, Reihingo obtulit? videlicet

(4) Venerat ſub auſpicium ineuntis anni ſupra milleſimum ſexcenteſimum primi in aulam. Martinus Rauſcherus, in Laudat. funebri Reihingi, apud Witte, Memor. Theol. p. 903.

(5) Paulus Freherus, in Theatr. Virorum illuſtr. p. 431.

(6) This is a phraſe of Plautus, which ſignifies the ſame as in numerato, or in promptu.

(7) Martin. Rauſcherus, in Laud. fun. Reihingi, apud Witte, Memor. Theol. p. 903.

(8) Virgil. Æn. lib. 2. ver. 148.

(9) Rauſcherus, ibid. p. 905.

(10) See the fragment of a Letter of the Jeſuit John Agricola, Chaplain in the army, to Count de Tilli. See, I ſay, this fragment in Oratione funebri Reihingi, apud Witte, Memor. Theol. p. 898, 899.

I

deſpiſing their inſidious flatteries, as likewiſe the ſlanderous reports they ſpread concerning him [D]. He grew dropſical the ſixth year of his converſion, and was ſuffocated by a catarrh videlicet optionem illi permiſerat, utrum in Lojolæ familia manere, an verò in Canonicum aut Laicum ſe componere eligeret : dummodo ad ſinum Romanæ Eccleſiæ rediret. Proferebat hanc in rem chartam puram, quam Itali biancam vocant, cui inſcriberet, quicquid animo collibitum eſſet ſuo : nec de approbatione Superiorum dubitaret (11). Conrad Reihing the Jeſuit, who was Rector of the College at Auſburg, and the convert's brother, was perpetually writing to, and exhorting him to return into the boſom of the Church (12) ; and ſeveral other Jeſuits wrote to him to the ſame purpoſe. Chriſtopher Grenzing, his Provincial, was the firſt who endeavoured to bring him back ; promiſing that the ſociety would be merciful to him. Quid dicam de literis Chriſtophori Grenzing Provincialis, qui primus ex omnibus à fuga illum retrahere tentavit cum hoc monito : quod Societas redeunti viſcera miſerationis & benignitatis recludat (13) ? Even the General himſelf, Mutius Vitelleſchi, cauſed him to be informed, with a thouſand proteſtations of ſincerity, that he ſhould be received with open arms, and that he ſhould not have the ſame treatment as Mark Antonio de Dominis had met with, but the moſt favourable uſage poſſible. But yet Reihing would not truſt to theſe promiſes ; or rather was ſo firmly perſuaded, that the Church he had left was not the true one, that he perſevered inviolably in the Proteſtant. George Stengelius the Jeſuit owned, in ſome printed pieces, that their ſociety had received a deep wound by his leaving their ſociety : Nec diſſimulavit hoc ipſum Georgius Stengelius, qui in ſcriptis ſuis hactenus publicatis, non uno loco conqueritur, ingens diſceſſione Reihingi Societati ſuæ vulnus eſſe inflictum (14). There is ſcarce any Order of Friers, out of which the Proteſtants have gained ſo few Proſelytes as from that of the Jeſuits, a circumſtance that encreaſed their ſorrow rather than leſſened it. It will appear by the following words, how greatly the Proteſtants triumphed on account of ſo ſingular an accident (15). Quod quidem factum, quàm illuſtre, quàm admirabile, quàm inſperatum rarumque nobis acciderit, ne commonere quidem vos opus eſt. Clericum Regularem, & Societatis Ignatianæ Patrem ad caſtra tranſire Evangelicorum, contra quos hactenus omni impetu ſteterat : ſive ut Latinè dicam, Jeſuitam fieri Lutheranum, res eſt imprimis memorabilis, & in tabulas æternitatis referenda. Res, cujus prædicatio, multorum adhuc ſeculorum ingenia, ipſamque poſteritatis memoriam fatigabit. Res, quam nemo hodie (16) aut fando acceperit, aut oculorum fide fuerit arbitratus. i. e. " I need not inform you, how " great, how wonderful, how unexpected and ſin- " gular this incident was. For a regular Prieſt, a fa- " ther of the ſociety of Jeſus, to go over to the " camp of the Proteſtants, whom he before had com- " bated with all his ſtrength : or to ſpeak plainly, " for a Jeſuit to turn Lutheran, is a moſt remarkable " event, and worthy of being inſcribed in the re- " giſters of eternity : an event, the applauſes where- " of ſhall employ the genius of many ſucceeding " ages, and even tire the memory of poſterity : an " event, which no man of the preſent age ever heard " of, or had been an eye-witneſs to." Such examples have been rare in France ; however, there was one there in 1647, when Jarrige turned Proteſtant.

(11) Rauſcherus, ibid. apud Witte, Memor. Theol. p. 912.

(12) Idem, ibid. p. 913.

(13) Rauſcherus, in Laud. funebri Reihingi, apud Witte, Memor. Theol. p. 913.

(14) Ibid. p. 899.

(15) Idem, ibid. p. 904.

(16) This Author had doubtleſs forgot the converſion of Haſenmullerus. I mention this in the rem. [E], of the art. JARRIGE.

[D] He deſpiſing . . . the ſlanderous reports they ſpread concerning him.] Some verſes in the German tongue were made againſt him, in which he was ſlandered in the moſt horrid manner ; and letters were ſpread in the cities or courts of Germany, in which he was deſcribed as a finiſhed villain. He was called a Paraſite, who had preferred good eating, and rich wines, to ſolitude and prayer. He was accuſed of having been too great a lover of the fair ſex ; to have been ſo far ſmit with a girl that he debauched her, and got her with child ; and that her protuberancy having diſcovered her crimes, he was obliged to fly in order to avoid an ignominious puniſhment. Circumvolitarunt vernacula lingua infames rythmi, & calumnioſæ literæ, aulas, urbes, oppida perniciosiſſimè pererrarunt. Narrarunt aulæ Palatinæ paraſitum : gynæcei aſſeclam : argenteos orbes, exquiſita fercula, & liquorem illius Dei, qui olim Indos expugnavit, præ lectione, præ oratione, præ ſolitudine amaſſe : vitæ cœlibis quietem deliciis prætuliſſe : Floræ & Veneris, non Societatis Sacerdotem fuiſſe : ſalacitatis lubidine pruriiſſe : ſpecioſam puellam impudicè deperiiſſe : inclinaſſe virginem, & infami compreſſu gravidaſſe : cumque illa uteri bulgam plus æquo intumeſcentem celare non poſſet, deſerto vadimonio, mali facinoris infamiam, & pœnas metuentem erupiſſe (17). Reihing refuted theſe ſlanders by a beautiful apology, which he ſent to the Court of Wirtemberg (18). A thing happened which evidently diſcovered his innocence. The Duke of Bavaria ſent three deputies to the Court, viz. Henry of Stein, Faber the Civilian, and Father Keller the Jeſuit, Rector of the College of Munich. Theſe were ordered to requeſt the delivering up of this deſerter, and they enumerated all the crimes that were laid to his charge. The Duke of Wirtemberg anſwered, that if Reihing was guilty of thoſe crimes, they had no more to do but to proceed againſt him according to law ; that he would appoint ſuch men for Judges as were men of integrity, who ſhould pronounce ſentence upon him impartially : but that if the Proſelyte was innocent, it would be but juſt to let him follow, undiſturbed, that religion which appeared to him the beſt (19). If it ſhould happen, added the Duke, that my two Chaplains ſhould quit their religion, I would not ſtir out of my chamber on that account. " Subjunxit hoc mantiſſæ loco gene- " roſiſſimus Princeps : Quod ſi fors hodie eveniret, " utrumque Aulæ meæ Concionatorem à Religione " ſua deficere : eorum cauſa, ne pedem quidem uni- " cum extra limen promoverem (20)." Upon this Father Keller had a conference with him, on which occaſion he reproached him with the great number of irregularities, which had given occaſion to ſo many ſongs and ſatyrical letters. Reihing vindicated himſelf on all theſe points, with great vigour, and even took an oath for his juſtification before the Duke of Bavaria's three deputies (21). " Memores reſponſi " iſtius, quod tibi comitibuſque tuis, in præſentia virorum " honoratiſſimorum, manu pectori admota, & ſublatis in " cœlum oculis catapultæ inſtar retorſit. Ego, inquie- " bat ille, in conſpectu Cœleſtis illius Arbitri hic con- " ſiſto, qui quæ nos gerimus, auditque & videt. Co- " ram divina ejus Majeſtate agnoſco me peccatorum " non infimum : ſed hunc teſtem invoco, vacare me " culpa omnium, quæ imputantur, probrorum : fal- " lentem vindicet, qui nunquam fallitur." i. e. " Re- " membring that anſwer, which he darted back, " like a battering engine, upon you and your com- " panions ; in the preſence of ſome moſt honourable " men, with eyes uplifted, and laying his hand on " his breaſt. I here ſtand, ſays he, before that celeſtial " Judge, who hears and ſees every thing we do. I " acknowledge myſelf, in preſence of his divine Majeſty, " not the leaſt of ſinners. However I call upon him to " witneſs, that I am guiltleſs of all thoſe crimes which " are laid to my charge : and may that Being, who never " errs, take vengeance of me, in caſe I tell an un- " truth." Keller not being able to make any impreſſion on his quondam brother Jeſuit, withdrew, ſaying at the ſame time, Eve has made you fall. His meaning on this occaſion was, that Reihing was prompted to quit the ſociety of the Jeſuits and Popery, from a deſire of getting a wife. All the accuſations were at laſt reduced to this ; the reſt vaniſhed ; but they perſiſted in aſſerting, that the only motive of his leaving the Romiſh Communion was, his having an amorous attachment. It is added, that after he had married, and had had many children, he found himſelf loaded with ſo many clogs, that he had not ſtrength enough to return into the boſom of the Church ; and that at his leaving the world he went to hell. Such is the reproach which Alegambe caſts at him. Prolapſus in turpes amores, ordinem, fidemque tranſfuga deſeruit, factus errorum magiſter : ductâ dein domum pellice pro uxore, ſuſceptis compluribus liberis, ita miſer implicatus eſt, ut ad veritatis confeſſionem redire not ſuſtineret. Sic in æternam mortem occubuit (22). This is ſo trite, ſo thread-bare a common place, that I am ſurprized writers are not weary of employing it. It has been turned a thouſand different ways ; and ſome warm men have choſe to employ it

(17) Rauſcherus, in Laud. funebri Reihingi, apud Witte, Memor. Theolog. p. 905.

(18) Idem, ibid. p. 906.

(19) Si hæc crimina, quorum rèum poſtularent, deferrentque, veritate niterentur : fas eſſe, & poteſtatem ipſis in Aula adverſus eum lege ac judicio experiri : habiturosque judicem neutri parti obnoxium, ſed ex æquo & bono jus dicentem. Sin autem, &c. Idem, ibid. p. 908.

(20) Idem, ibid.

(21) Idem, ibid. p. 906. Theſe are the words of the Orator, addreſſed to Father Keller.

(22) Alegambe, Bibl. Script. Societ. p. 209. It is to be obſerved, that Father Sotuel has ſuppreſſed the whole article of James Reihing.

a catarrh ſome time after (e) [E]. Several new falſities were ſpread concerning his death [F]. Here follows a catalogue of his writings [G].

(e) Extracted from Spizelius, in Templo Honoris reſerato, p. 95 & ſeq.

REINESIUS

it againſt all the Proteſtants in general, than againſt the Proſelytes. They ſay, that the firſt care the Proteſtants have with regard to a Monk or a Prieſt, who goes over to their Communion, is to look out a wife for him: this is a comment they employ in order to incorporate him into their ſect, and to keep him firmly attached to it (23). They are perſuaded that ſuch birds of prey as theſe cannot be better allured, nor ſo over-tamed, than by that bit of fleſh. But how groſs is all this! I relate it only as an inſtance of the brutal expreſſions, which controverſial writers often make uſe of. Quinetiam auſim dicere eos ſtudioſius multò laborare in quærenda quamprimùm, & fucati conjugii glutino alliganda unicuique transfugæ concubina, quàm in indaganda vitæ præteritæ ratione ac moribus. Illud quippe certò credunt non poſſe id genus accipitres vel efficaciùs accerſiri, vel meliùs cicurari, quam ſi ejuſmodi carnis illicio ineſcentur (24). Father Reihing doubtleſs foreſaw, that they expected he would do the ſame, and that he ſhould be expoſed to thoſe ſevere jokes, in caſe he married; but he paid a great regard to the tenet of the great Apoſtle of the gentiles, who orders Biſhops to marry; and who has ranked among the doctrines of Satan, the prohibition with regard to marriage. He therefore married the year following; and made choice in his native country, of a wife whom he had never ſeen (25). She was an excellent woman, and of a very good family; beautiful, prudent, and adorned with virtues of every kind. Altero, poſtquam in hanc urbem venit, anno, cum Tarſenſis Apoſtoli mandatum animo ſecum verſaret, quo EPISCOPUM unius Uxoris Virum eſſe juſſit, & quo nomine ipſe ille Gentium Doctor doctrinam matrimonio interdicentium appellaret, animum ad conjugium appulit, exemploque ſuo vetus illud Euripidis comprobavit: Fatalem viro fœminæque torum eſſe (26).

(23) Compare this with the Nouvelles Lettres de la Critique generale de Maimbourg, p. 497, 498.

(24) Jacob. Gualterius, Tabula Chronographica, ſæc. 11. cap. 6. p. m. 636.

(25) Her name was Mary Velſer, and ſhe was the daughter of Anthony Felix Velſer, Morum & virtutum & formæ ornamentis conſpicua lectiſſimaque Virgo. Rauſcherus, in Laudat. funebri Reibingi, apud Witte, Memor. Theol. p. 909.

(26) Idem, ibid.

A REFLEXION on the paſſage in which St. Paul ſeems to command Biſhops to marry.

It is to be obſerved that Reihing, and the author of his funeral orations explain St. Paul's words as a precept: theſe declare that the Apoſtle commands the Miniſters of the Goſpel to marry, and to have but one wife. This doubtleſs would be the true interpretation of St. Paul's words, was it to be underſtood literally, I mean according to the rules of Grammar; for the words which denote the Biſhop's marriage with one wife, are as much governed by the word muſt (27), as thoſe which denote the Biſhop's blameleſs life, his ſobriety, prudence, gravity, modeſty, equity, moderation and diſintereſtedneſs. Now as it would be abſurd to pretend, that St. Paul leaves Miniſters at liberty to be ſober, modeſt, blameleſs, &c. or to be otherwiſe; it is abſurd to pretend, that he leaves it to their choice to marry a woman or not to marry with any; this, I ſay, is abſurd, if we ſtick to the literal ſenſe, and ſuppoſe that St. Paul adhered ſtrictly to the Grammar rules. I do not ſpeak of ſuch a rigorous accuracy as is obſerved in articles of a treaty of peace, in which all the expreſſions are weighed, to prevent any abuſe that might ariſe from an ambiguity, or the omiſſion of a particle. Nor do I ſpeak of the ſevere accuracy of thoſe ſcrupulous, pedantic Grammarians, who had rather employ three hours in correcting a period, than to let the leaſt negligence eſcape them. I ſpeak of a clear and unconfuſed way of expreſſion, as perſons of good ſenſe would uſe in a letter, in which they ſhould give ſome orders to a tutor. Should a parent write as follows: I will have my children ſay their prayers twice a day; to go to Church twice a week; to forbear ſwearing and quarrelling; to be obedient to their mother, and to go to the Play-houſe every Monday; the tutor would look upon all theſe as precepts; and not conclude that it was left to his diſcretion, either to take his pupils to the Play-houſe every Monday, or not take them; for, in this caſe, he would have ſuppoſed that the parent would not have connected I will, with have them go to the Play-houſe; and that the parent of his pupils would have changed the verb; that he ſhould ſay, for inſtance, and I give you leave to take them to the Play-houſe every Monday. It therefore muſt be granted, that if a ſophiſt ſhould perſiſt obſtinately in maintaining, that whatever St. Paul ſays of the qualities of a Biſhop is obligatory, it would not be eaſy to refute it; and that a perſon would be forced humbly to beg his leave, to permit him to depart from the ſtrictneſs of the Grammar rules (28): ſince it is not likely, that the Apoſtle in queſtion would exclude from epiſcopacy thoſe, who had the gift of continency, and were adorned with all the talents requiſite for a Biſhop. By this we ſee, that too ſcrupulous an adherence to the literal ſenſe of the Scripture, would frequently lead into error; and that the axiom, ſummum jus ſumma injuria, ought to be often obſerved and conſidered by the interpreters. We ſee, at the ſame time, that we muſt do, not what the Apoſtles ordain according to the grammatical ſenſe; but what good ſenſe tells us they intend to ordain. St. Paul, according to the laws of Grammar, commands Biſhops to marry; but reaſon ſuggeſts to us, that he intended only to forbid their having a plurality of wives. We muſt therefore adhere to this. Reihing, and thoſe of the ſame opinion with him, are in the wrong to ſuppoſe that an order is here given to marry; all we rationally find in it is leave for that purpoſe; but their error deſerves much more to be excuſed, than the abominable boldneſs in forbidding the Clergy to marry. Chriſtians will never be able to juſtify themſelves before God, for their baſe weakneſs in ſuffering the annulling of the laws of St. Paul, than which none were ever more clear, deciſive and intelligible. They have been ſeverely puniſhed for this by the horrid flood of impurities that have polluted their families, and which ſtill pollute them. I will obſerve by the way, that the Scriptures have been treated by the Chriſtians in much the ſame manner as the Code of Juſtinian. They are very glad when the common law agrees with the written law; but if they find their account better in the common, than in the written law, they diſpenſe with the want of conformity. The Chriſtian Religion, during many ages, was not a country, as it were, governed by written laws.

(28) It is here we ſhould apply the rule of Grammar, Grammaticæ leges plerunque Eccleſia ſpernit.

[E] He was ſuffocated by a catarrh ſome time after.] Here follows a freſh omiſſion of Spizelius. He does not ſet down either the day or the year of Reihing's death. To ſupply this defect, I ſhall obſerve that this quondam Jeſuit died the 5th of May 1628 (29). He went to a bath, by the advice of Phyſicians, and having laid down to take ſome reſt, he fell aſleep and never waked. His Panegyriſt calls this a happy death (30), ſuch a one as Auguſtus wiſhed might befall himſelf and his friends. Ultimum maximumque mortalium votorum nactus, εὐθανασίαν, quam ille orbis Regnator Auguſtus olim ſibi ſuiſque exoptavit (31).

(29) Rauſcherus, in Laud. funebri Reibingi, apud Witte, Memor. Theol. p. 916. Micrælius, Synt. Hiſt. Eccleſ. p. m. 778, fixes his death at 1624, which is wrong.

[F] Several new falſities were ſpread concerning his death.] He was reported to be dead before he really was; his dropſy was aſcribed to the vengeance of heaven; his dying without receiving the Communion occaſioned many ſevere reflections; they affirmed that he was tortured, in his expiring moments, by the ſtings of conſcience (32); at laſt they gave out that, juſt as he was dying, he recanted in preſence of his neighbours. It is very proper to take notice of ſuch particulars, as they ſhew the blindneſs and fury of paſſions, and the deſtruction of good ſenſe. Vidimus volantes è vicinia chartas, immò ab Allobrogibus uſque in manus noſtras pervenerunt literæ, quæ eum in ſuprema vitæ meta poſitum, Evangelium ejeraſſe, & in præſentia Vicinorum, ipſiuſque D. PREGITZERI palinodiam ceciniſſe loquerentur. O linguæ! ô calami! ô animorum effrons nequitia! Pudor & verecundia quò receſſiſtis? Aliter tu loqueris Reverende Pregizere (33). i. e. " We have ſeen papers, from the neighbourhood, " ſpread among us; nay letters, from the South of " France, have come to us, which declare that he, " in his expiring moments, abjured the Goſpel; and " recanted, in preſence of his neighbours and of " Pregitzer himſelf. O tongues! O pens! O impu- " dent wickedneſs! Shame and modeſty, to what re- " gions are you withdrawn? Thou, O reverend Pre- " gizer, will ſpeak in a different ſtrain."

(30) Compare this with rem. [F] of the art. REGIUS.

(31) Rauſcher. in Laud. funeb. Reibingi, apud Witte, Memor. Theolog. p. 916.

(32) Horrentis conſcientiæ morſibus mortalitatis lineæ jam vicinus infeſtari cœpit. Ibid. p. 917.

(33) Idem, ibid.

[G] Here follows a catalogue of his writings.] His firſt work was printed at Colen in 1615, under the

(27) Δεῖ οὖν τὸν ἐπίσκοπον ἀνεπίλημπτον εἶναι, μιᾶς γυναικὸς ἄνδρα, νηφάλεον, σώφρονα, &c. Oportet ergo epiſcopum irreprehenſibilem eſſe, unius uxoris virum, ſobrium, prudentem, &c. 1 Timoth. cap. iii. ver. 2.

REINESIUS (THOMAS), one of the moſt learned men of the 17th Century, was born at Gotha (a) a city of Thuringia in Germany, the 13th of December 1587 [A]. He was a Phyſician, but applied himſelf with prodigious aſſiduity to the ſtudy of polite literature, in which part of learning he chiefly excelled. He had practiſed phyſic in other places (b), when he ſettled at Altemburg, to be Phyſician of that city, where he reſided ſeveral years, and was made a burgomaſter. At laſt, after having been raiſed to the employment of Counſellor to the Elector of Saxony, he went and lived at Leipſic, and died there the 14th of February (c) 1667 (d). He had often refuſed to be a Profeſſor from the fear he was under of meeting with inſupportable Collegues [B], and it is highly probable, that, had he accepted of any academical employment, he would have been involved

(a) And not at Altemburg, as it is ſaid in Moreri.

(b) Witte, in Diario Biographico, ad ann. 1667. Vide the rem. [B], citat. (10).

(c) And not in 1657, as we are told in Konig's Bibliotheque, in Moreri, and other Authors.

(d) Ex eodem Witte, in Diario Biographico, ad ann. 1667.

title of Muri civitatis ſanctæ, hoc eſt Fundamenta XII Religionis Catholicæ quibus inſiſtens Sereniſſimus Princeps Neoburgicus, Lutheraniſmo abdicato in Eccleſiam pedem intulit. He was at that time a violent Papiſt. Balthazar Meiſnerus, Fabrice Baſſecourt, and Matthias Hoe wrote againſt him. Meiſnerus è theſibus ſcalam centum & quadraginta gradus altam fabricavit, qua MUROS BABYLONIS ROMANÆ, ET CONFICTA PAPISTICÆ RELIGIONIS FUNDAMENTA demoliebatur. Baſſecourtus TUBA DEI armatus, AD SUBVERTENDOS MUROS Eccleſiæ Romanæ progreſſus, eos velut illa Hierichuntis mœnia uno clangore diffiare & ſolo æquare eſt aggreſſus. Ultimus Matthias Hoe Enchiridion oppoſuit, in quo Romanæ fidei nebulæ clariſſima Scripturarum luce diſcutiebantur (34). He publiſhed an anſwer to the two firſt, and it was printed at Newburg in 1617. The title of it is as follows: Excubiæ Angelicæ Civitatis Sanctæ pro defenſione XII Fundamentorum Catholicorum Balthaſari Meiſniro præconi Lutherano, & Fabricio Baſſecourt, Tibicini Calviniano oppoſitæ. He anſwered Matthias Hoe in German, and the title of his reply anſwers to what follows: Enchiridium Catholicum Manuali D. Hoe oppoſitum. See the title of the works he publiſhed, after he had embraced the confeſſion of Auſburg. Laquei Pontificii contriti; quibus, adjuvante DOMINO, liberatus, Liberatori ſuo Ter Opt. Max. libenter meritò publicas gratias in Academia Tubingenſi dicere voluit. Tubingæ 1622 in 4to. Germanicè, ibidem eodem anno in 4to. Diſſertatio de vera Chriſti in terris Eccleſia, adverſus larvatum Jeſuitam Dillinganum, ibid. 1622 in 4to. Araneorum operæ, quas contra laqueos Pontificios contritos texturam improbam ſuſpenderunt Georgius Stengelius, Simon Schaitenreiſſer, & Laur. Forerus, Stylo Reihingi dejectæ, ibid. 1623 in 4to. Apologeticus pro Diſſertatione ſua, de Eccleſia Chriſti, ibid. 1624, in 4to. He publiſhed in German (35), a recantation of the book written by him againſt Doctor Matthias Hoe.

(34) Rauſcher. in Laud. funebri Reihingi, apud Witte, Memor. Theol. p. 900.

(35) At Tubingen, in 1623.

[A] He was born . . . the 13th of December 1587.] Though I ſaw this date in large letters under the print of Reineſius prefixed to one of his books (1), I nevertheleſs was a little diffident about it, when I conſidered that the Authors of Acta Eruditorum ſay that he died the 14th of February 1667, aged ſeventy years (2). Theſe Journaliſts are very accurate; and no one had a better opportunity than they had of knowing the true age of this learned man. I alſo ſaw that Andrew Charles Abbot of St George in the territory of Wirtemberg obſerves that he lived upwards of ſeventy years, obiit Thomas Reineſius ſeptuagenario major (3). Writers do not ſpeak in this manner of a man who dies in his eightieth year. But I was no longer uncertain when I found a letter of Reineſius, in which it is affirmed, that it was near ſeventy years that his maſters had adviſed him to conſult Dictionaries often (4). He wrote this the 10th of February 1665. This is a very ſtrong confirmation of the date we find under the print.

(1) His Letters ad Hoffmannum & Rupertum, printed at Leipſic in 1660.

(2) Acta Eruditorum, Leipſ. 1682. p. 92.

(3) Andreas Carolus, Memor. Eccleſ. lib. 7. ad ann. 1667. p. 409.

(4) Reineſ. Ep. 29. ad Joannem Vorſtium, p. 61.

[B] He had often refuſed to be a Profeſſor, from the fear he was under of meeting with inſupportable Collegues.] His firſt letter (5), to Gaſpar Hoffman Profeſſor of Phyſic in Altorf, informs me of this particular. This Profeſſor had informed him by letter, that, during thirty years, he had been expoſed to the noiſe and ſlanders of thoſe who envied him, and that he had been attacked with great violence (6). Reineſius replied, that he alſo was perſecuted by certain jealous wrong-headed people; that there was ſo little true friendſhip left in the world, and ſo little order and juſtice among the learned, that, in order to avoid the ſtorm, he had concealed himſelf the greateſt part of his life. Me quoque circumſtrepunt & adfligunt turbæ æmulorum, invidorum ſuſurri, ſemidoctorum impudentia judicia. His enim heu! execrandis moribus hodiè vivitur, ut de Bonis judicent peſſimi, de artibus imperiti, in literis dominentur thraſones; omnia ſint fucata, & genuinarum amicitiarum nihil ferè reſtet; quas intemperies ſeriò deploravi ſemper, & ut declinarem iſta paſſiva, βιώσας maximam partem λέληθα (7). Having been frequently invited to accept of academical Profeſſorſhips, adds he, I refuſed them; I believing that it would not be poſſible for me to bear with the ill humours of certain perſons with whom I ſhould have been obliged to aſſociate; and I choſe rather to live here though I had a very eaſy life. He was then Phyſician to the city of Altemburg. Nominatus toties ab Academicis, vocatuſque à Principibus ad munus docendi publicum; repugnavi, ſocio uno alteroque è noſtratibus (non enim ſum πολύφιλος) conſilii, voluntatibus utrorumque, quòd mores incommodos nonnullorum, cum quibus vivendum eſſet, tolerare poſſe non confiderem, & manſi in ſtatione, nec ipſa ſatis commodâ (8). Here follows part of the inconveniencies the particulars of which he enumerates. Theſe are not improper in this place, as they are ſo many circumſtances relating to the hiſtory of his life (9). Quid enim hoc decennio Altenburgi (Curienſia & Gerana (10) tranſmittam, etſi & illic ſat fuerit nubilorum) non expertus ſum, in quo non tentatus? Poſt triſte ſpectaculum expilatæ domûs amiſi intra ſemeſtre tres jucundiſſ. filios, ſuaviſſimam conjugem, incomparabilem fœminam; ſolum animus DEO nixus & invictus mihi ſupereſt, cum tantillo boni nomini, & quantum ſatis eſt frugali opum. Λιτῶς μὲν ἀλλ' ἐν ἐλευθερίᾳ. Trinâ vice, me Phyſico, τὸ λοιμῶδες ἐπιδήμιον hanc urbem adflavit . . . Conjugium, quod ante triennium ſecundum inivi, eſt incommodius, quàm ſperaveram, & multis rei familiaris tricis, quas tamen deprecatus fui, me involvit, &, quod caput eſt, ſterile; quò malo triſtius nihil obvenire poterat antè liberis orbato, ᾧ ὅλῳ ἀπιφιφάτῳ. i. e. "What trials have I not undergone, what difficulties "have I not met with, during theſe ten years, at "Altenburg, not to mention Hoff and Gera where I "ſuffered very much? After the melancholy acci"dent of having my houſe plundered, I was ſo un"happy as to loſe, in leſs than half a year, three "delightful boys, with a moſt engaging and in"comparable wife. The only thing now left me is "a mind which, relying entirely upon God, cannot "be overcome; with a little reputation, and as "much wealth as is ſufficient for a frugal perſon. "I choſe for my motto plainly but freely. Since my "being Phyſician in this city, it has been thrice "afflicted with the Plague. My ſecond wife, whom "I married about three years ago, has involved me "in more inconveniencies than I was aware of; and "encumbered me with many petty domeſtic cares, "I had always wiſhed to be free from; and, which "is the moſt grievous circumſtance of all, ſhe is bar"ren, than which nothing more calamitous could "have happened to a man, who, before, had loſt all "his children, and is entirely deſtitute as it were."

(5) It is dated at Altemburg, Octob. 10. 1638.

(6) See Reineſius's Letters, ad Hoffmannum & Rupertum, p. 2.

(7) Idem, ibid. p. 6.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Ibid. p. 7.

(10) He underſtands by Curienſia, the employment of Phyſician to the city of Hoff (in Latin Curia) in Voitgland; and by Gerana a like employment at Gera, a city in the ſame country belonging to the Lords of Plaven, whoſe family name is Reuſſen, in Latin Rutheni.

I am to obſerve, that many deſigning perſons had ſent to Hoffman ſeveral ſheets of the three books of Reineſius's Variarum Lectionum whilſt it was at preſs. They did this in hopes of making Hoffman write againſt that work (11); but they were diſappointed in their views; for Hoffman finding himſelf applauded in that part of the book which was ſent to him, forgave the affront he imagined he had received from Reineſius, and wrote a very obliging letter

(11) Reineſ. Epiſt. ad Hoffmannum & Rupertum, p. 5.

volved in many quarrels; for he could not avoid falling out with a Profeſſor at Leipſic, though they lived at ſo great a diſtance from one another. This at firſt was a literary conteſt, but afterwards roſe to a law-ſuit (e). I cannot ſay whether Reineſius left any children; but I know that in 1638 he complained of having loſt his firſt wife, as well as the children ſhe had brought him; and had then been married three years to a ſecond wife, who was barren (f). This was the chief, but not the only inconveniency he found in theſe ſecond nuptials. He partook of the liberality, which Lewis XIV. indulged the moſt famous learned men in Europe. At the ſame time that the preſent was ſent him, he received a very obliging letter from Mr. Colbert, for which favour he ſhewed his gratitude, by dedicating to him his obſervations on the fragment of Petronius in 1666. Such as are able to judge of a literary ſubject, have no ſooner read a few pages of his writings, but they take him from among the number of thoſe Philologers whoſe only talent is memory; and rank him among ſuch critics who go beyond what they read, and know more than their books taught them. Their penetration makes them draw a great many conſequences; and ſuggeſts conjectures, which lead them to the diſcovery of hidden treaſures. By this means they dart a light into the moſt gloomy places of literature, and extend the limits of the knowledge of antiquity. Reineſius was in this claſs of critics; and he made it his utmoſt endeavours to diſcover things which had not been obſerved by others. Should his Supplement to Voſſius De Hiſtoricis Græcis be publiſhed, the world will wonder that Voſſius, who had drawn up ſo beautiful and ample a collection, ſhould have omitted a great number of particulars. We learn by Reineſius's printed letters, that he was conſulted as an oracle; that he anſwered very learnedly whatever queſtions were brought to him; that he was extremely well ſkilled in the families of ancient Rome, and in the ſtudy of inſcriptions. A very fine elogium is given of his merit, as well as of his learned letter to him (12). I fancy I ſhall not be miſtaken, if I venture to ſay, that the ſharpeſt quarrel in which Reineſius was ever engaged, was that he had with Rivinus profeſſor in Leipſic. Reineſius declares that he himſelf was not the aggreſſor; and that he had only replied to the injurious expreſſions of that antique. Nevertheleſs, the latter made his complaints to the Magiſtrates; and endeavoured to the utmoſt of his power to prevent Reineſius's anſwer from being publiſhed. Can any thing be more unjuſt? Nunquam odio habui hominem; ſed calumniatorem & projectiſſimæ proterviæ accuſatorem ferre non debui tamen. Etiamnum hodie crepant nutantque ſubſellia Judicum apud Nos, ad quos me, ſtulte querens de injuriis quas Ipſe prior intuliſſet, deferebat, neque ſuæ famæ ſatis cavens, dum meam maculare intenderet μετὰ πολλῆς φαντασίας καὶ ὑψηλ. ληγορίας. . . . . Defenſionem meam, quàm à provocantis impudentia impoſita mihi neceſſitas excuſat, in amicorum ſinu depoſui (13) . . . Dixit, quæ voluit; æquum eſt ut audiat quæ nolet. . . . Ex eo vero, quod apologiam meam tot adhibitis machinis, mendaciis etiam, ſupprimere anniſus fuit, malam cauſam fovere judicatus eſt dudum, & deſignaſſe facinus, quod æternam nomini ejus inuſſit notam. Voluit nimirum ut ipſe de me cenſor ſedere poſſet, ſed ἀνυπεύθυνος; voluit ut liceret ſibi in me quidvis; mihi ne quidem hiſcere contrà (14). i. e. "I never "bore hatred to the man; but then I did not think "myſelf obliged to bear with his calumnies and moſt "impudent accuſations. Our Law Courts, even to "this day, echo with his ſilly complaints againſt me, "though for injuries which I had received from "him. He does not value how much he injures his "own reputation, provided he can but injure mine, "with his odd inſinuations and inflated expreſſions. "I have put into the hands of my friends the de"fenſe I drew up for myſelf, which his inſolence "rendered excuſable in me. He indulged his incli"nation in ſaying whatever he pleaſed; it is there"fore juſt he ſhould hear things that will be ungrate"ful to him. . . . But, from his endeavouring, by "ſo many artifices and lies, to ſuppreſs my Apolo"gy, it has been long ſince concluded that he was "engaged in a bad cauſe; and alſo proved that "he had wicked views, which have branded his "name with eternal infamy. He deſired truly to "ſit as cenſor over my actions, without being called "to account for it; he would have had the liberty "to do what he pleaſed with me, and not ſuffer me "to make the leaſt complaint againſt him." Reineſius's Apology was printed, in ſpite of the oppoſition made by the aggreſſor. I have extracted this from a letter written the 7th of Auguſt 1653. See alſo the letter which Reineſius wrote to Boſius the 18th of January of the ſame year (15).

(e) See the rem. [B].

(f) See the ſame rem.

(12) Reineſ. Ep. ad Hoffmannum & Rupertum, p. 1.

(13) Reineſ. Ep. 44. ad Daumium, p. 122.

(14) Ibid. p. 123.

(15) Epiſt. Thomæ Reineſii, & Jo. Andr. Boſii, p. 13.

A REFLECTION on the imperfections of men of learning, and the difficulty of acquiring tranquillity of mind.

What I have here related, with regard to the misfortunes which Reineſius complained of, ſeems to be the common fate of the learned. The hiſtory of their lives and letters ſhew almoſt always, that they have been engaged in troubleſome conteſts, in which jealouſy, calumny, paſſion, ſatyrs, a ſpirit of faction, fraud, and a thouſand other ſhameful paſſions diſperſe all their venom. Men of learning ſeem to be thoſe who conſpire moſt againſt their own repoſe, and that of their neighbours. This muſt needs create a contempt and hatred for the Sciences; or at leaſt make people no longer entertain the good opinion they otherwiſe might have of them. Ignorant perſons imagine, that had they devoted their whole time to reading, they would have learnt to bridle their paſſions, and to root up a great many faults which prompt them to behave with injuſtice towards their neighbour. But would it be poſſible for them to continue in this way of thinking, did they hear in what manner the moſt learned men abuſe and perſecute one another, and complain of their unhappy fate? Hence we may draw this inference, that nothing is more difficult to acquire than peace and tranquillity of mind. An uninterrupted ſtudy of good books ſeem to be a very natural way of obtaining this treaſure, and yet it ſeldom procures it, and is often productive of the contrary vice. Horace had no manner of notion of this when he wrote as follows: It is enough that I beſeech God to preſerve my life, and give me riches; I myſelf will be able to procure to myſelf peace of mind.

Quid ſentire putas? quid credis, amice, precari?
Sit mihi, quod nunc eſt, etiam minus: ut mihi vivam
Quod ſupereſt ævi, ſi quid ſupereſſe volunt Dî:
Sit bona librorum & proviſæ frugis in annum
Copia: ne fluitem dubiæ ſpe pendulus horæ.
Sed ſatis eſt orare Jovem, qui donat, & aufert,
Det vitam, det opes: æquum mî animum ipſe parabo (16).

(16) Horat. Ep. 18. lib. 1. in fine.

"What thoughts d'ye think thoſe eaſy joys inſpire?
"What do you think I covet or deſire?
"'Tis that I may but undiſturb'd poſſeſs
"The little I have, and if heav'n pleaſes, leſs;
"That I to nature and myſelf may give
"The little time that I have left to live;
"Some books in which I ſome new thoughts may find,
"To entertain and to refreſh my mind;
"Some horſes, which may help me to partake
"The lawful pleaſures which the ſeaſons make;
"An eaſy plenty, which at leaſt may ſpare
"The frugal pains of a domeſtic care;
"A friend, if that a faithful friend there be,
"Who can love ſuch an idle life and me;

"Then

learned and political works, in the dedication (g) to the ſecond edition of Caſaubon's Epiſtles. Some Divines have accuſed him of forming to himſelf a particular religion, compoſed of what he judged the beſt in all others [C]. Hereunder is a catalogue of the greateſt part of his works [D].

(g) Writ by Grævius, and dated at Amſterdam the 31ſt of Auguſt 1655. It is cited in Moreri, and nothing elſe is cited in it, though this Letter makes ſcarce any mention of the particulars related here.

RELAND

" Then heav'n give me but life and health, I'll
" find
" A grateful ſoul and a contented mind."
POOLY, in the tranſlation of Horace, by ſeveral hands.

But Horace was greatly miſtaken; the very thing for which he imagined he ſhould leaſt want the aſſiſtance of God, was what he ought to have leaſt expected from his own abilities and ſtrength, and the firſt he ought to ſue for from Jupiter; for it is much eaſier for a man by his induſtry, to acquire riches and honours than tranquillity of mind. If it be ſaid that honours and riches depend on a thouſand particulars which are not in our diſpoſal; we therefore ought to pray that God may turn them to our advantage; to this I anſwer, that the ſilence and obedience of the paſſions, tranquillity of ſoul, and peace of mind, depend on a thouſand things which are not in our power. The ſtomach, the ſpleen, the lymphatic veſſels, the fibres of the brain, and an hundred other organs neither the ſeat nor figure whereof are known to Anatomiſts, give riſe to many uneaſineſſes, jealouſies and griefs. Is it in our power to change thoſe organs (17)?

(17) Thoſe words of Horace, Epiſt. 1. lib. 1. ver. ult. præcipue ſanus, (He ſpeaks of the wiſe men of the Stoicks) niſi cum pituita moleſta eſt, i. e. " But chiefly " well, except " when vext " with phlegm." (Creech) may be very well applied to the ſoul, ſuppoſing ſanus to ſignify tranquillity of mind.

[C] Some Divines have accuſed him of forming to himſelf a particular religion, compoſed of what he judged the beſt in all others.] A Divine of Wirtemberg, whom I quoted above, affirms that Reineſius, who uſed to go to the Lutheran Churches, and received the Communion with him, ſpoke ſo ill of their Divines, of their Doctrine, and their Liturgies, that a profeſſed enemy ſcarce equalled him. From thence it was concluded, that he was of the religion of the prudent, or favoured it: ſince he had openly declared, that he followed one religion in certain points, and another in another. Tam ſiniſtrè ſenſit, tam ſcabiosè locutus eſt, de Doctoribus & Profeſſoribus harum (Lutheranarum) partium, imò de ipſa doctrina, de ſymbolicis libris, de dogmatibus in iiſdem contentis, ut vix quiſquam ex manifeſtis adverſariis taliter fecerit. Probari hæc poſſunt ex Epiſtolis, quas an. 1654 vel circiter, Coloniæ Brandeburgicæ publicavit, ubi contemptim Formularios vocat Theologos F. C. amplexos; D. Majorem Seniorem, Grandionem, qui applauſores nullos in N. habeat; alios nominat Archiperecidas, & ita conſeq. Religioni Prudentum procul ambiguo addictus erat Sycophanta, vel eidem certè favebat apertè faſſus, hoc ſe in una Religione, aliud in alia ſequi (18). This Divine had explained in another place, what he underſtood by the religion of the prudent. The ſubſtance of his diſcourſe is as follows. A Dutchman ſaid one day, that Grotius's religion was that of learned men. What religion is that, ſays ſome one to him? They believe as they pleaſe, replied he (19). Hulſeman (20) aſks, whether Grotius's meaning is, that one ought to follow the determination or opinion of prudent men; and he thinks that this is the religion of the prudent which is known to few perſons, and is very much cried up in France, and chiefly in Holland. Upon this Mullerus, a Hamburg Divine (21), and Kromaier a Divine of Leipſic (22), looked upon it as certain, that Grotius had followed the religion of the prudent, which is a mixture of ſeveral religions; and borrows, ſometimes from one, and at other times from the other, whatever they pleaſe, and ſuits it to their intereſt. It is called the religion of the prudent, becauſe the wiſe men of this world chooſe it with great prudence, as they imagine, and keep it as long as they pleaſe; it is alſo called the political and philoſophical religion. The former of theſe names is given it, becauſe it is choſen by politicians; they being men who ſeek for freedom in that point, and turn to every ſide. The epithet philoſophical is alſo given, becauſe it frees a man from the obligation of believing; and it is well known that a Philoſopher never ſubmits to the authority of any perſon, he being a man who boaſts the utmoſt freedom, and will not ſwear to the words of any maſter; liber homo Philoſophus nullius addictus jurare in verba Magiſtri. The Author mentions two other names: he ſays that this religion of the prudent is called Ecclectic, or Eclogiſtic (23). I am ſurprized that he did not make ſome mention of the ſect of Ecclectic Philoſophers founded by Potamon of Alexandria, who lived in the time of Auguſtus. Theſe people were neither Platoniſts, Stoicks, nor Peripateticks, nor of any particular Sect; but they ſelected whatever they thought good in every one of them and left the reſt. Such is the ſketch of the religion aſcribed to Reineſius. It was a religion of choice, a moſaic work, a work formed of inlaid pieces. More people, than the world are aware of, form, in this manner, a religion to themſelves, without telling the world of it. They might be called in Latin, Miſcelliones (24), i. e. Thoſe who hold a variety of opinions.

(18) Andreas Carolus, Memorabil. Eccleſ. ſæc. 17. lib. 6. cap. 32. p. 97.

(19) Idem, lib. 5. cap. 53. p. 1088. He cites Burgold. Not. rer. Imp. part. 2. 11.

(20) In Diatr. Schol. de Auxil. Grat. p. 479.

(21) Atheiſ. devict. p. 459.

(22) Loc. Antiſyncret. p. 271 & ſeq.

(23) Andreas Carolus, lib. 6. cap. 32. p. 97.

(24) Miſcelliones appellantur qui non certæ ſunt ſententiæ, ſed variorum mixtorumque judiciorum. Feſtus Pompeius.

[D] A catalogue of the greateſt part of his works.] Here follow thoſe in phyſic: De vaſis umbilicalibus eorumque ruptura obſervatio ſingularis, Leipſic 1624 in 4to. Chimiatria, hoc eſt Medicina nobili & neceſſaria ſui parte, Chimiâ, inſtructa & exornata, Gera in Voigtland 1624 in 4to. The following books relate to Literature: De Deo Endovellico, Altemburg 1637. Ἰσορούμενα linguæ Punicæ contra Vitum Wolfrum, Altemburg 1637. Variarum Lectionum libri tres, ibid. 1640 in 4to. Defenſio variarum Lectionum, Roſtoch 1653 in 4to. Epiſtolæ ad Caſparum Hoffmannum, & Chriſt. Ad Rupertum, Leipſic 1660 in 4to. After his death were printed, Epiſtolæ ad Johannem Vorſtium, at Coln in Brandenburg 1667 in 4to. Epiſtolæ ad Neſteros patrem & filium, Leipſic 1670 in 4to. Epiſtolæ ad Chriſtianum Daumium, Jena 1670 in 4to. Epiſtolæ ad Jo. Andream Boſium, Jena 1700 in 12mo. Syntagma Inſcriptionum antiquarum cum primis Romæ Veteris quarum omiſſa eſt recenſio in vaſto Jani Gruteri opere, cujus iſthoc dici poſſit Supplementum, cum Commentariis abſolutiſſimis (25), Leipſic 1682 in folio. Diſſertatio Critica de Sibyllinis Oraculis (26), Jena 1685, in 4to. I cannot ſay any thing certain with regard to ſome other books which Konig aſcribes to him; for I am afraid he has confounded thoſe which have been printed with ſuch as have not. He aſcribes to him, Gloſſarium vocum barbaricarum: cenſuram nonnullorum in Salmaſii Exercitationibus Plinianis. Commentarium in Inſcriptiones Gruteri. Variarum Lectionum libros ſex. Ἰσορέμινα Medicinæ, vel ſucceſſiones & vitas Medicorum, and ſeveral other works. Moreri ſays, that Reineſius made himſelf known by the ſix books he publiſhed of various readings; that he alſo wrote a cenſure on Salmaſius's Exercitations on Pliny or Solinus, and Commentaries on Gruter's inſcriptions (27). I cannot agree with him in this, there being only three books of various readings publiſhed; and I do not know of Reineſius's book, entitled, Cenſura Exercitationum Plinianarum Salmaſii. I find no mention of this in the Prefaces to his poſthumous works. I do not doubt but he was very able to write ſuch a book; and to cut out a work for Salmaſius no leſs than for Barthius (28): but I do not know that he had any ſuch deſign; and if he had, I am firmly of opinion that he never publiſhed ſuch a performance. The cenſure on Salmaſius's Exercitations was not publiſhed; the inſcriptions which Reineſius illuſtrated are different from thoſe of Gruter. Laſtly, Moreri makes no mention of ſeveral works that were certainly printed. Were his article of Reineſius to be corrected, ſcarce more than two or three words of it could be preſerved.

(25) See Acta eruditor. 1682. p. 89 & ſeq.

(26) See Nouv. de la Repub. des Lettres, July 1685. art. 5.

(27) See Jugem. des Savans, ſur les Critiques, num. 525.

(28) See rem. [R] of the art. BARTHIUS.

I am to inform my readers, that the bookſellers prefixed Reineſius's name to a book, though he did not write a ſingle line of it. Witte mentions this to prevent Reineſius from being taken for a plagiary: Exiit quoque Lipſiæ an. 1679 ſub ejus nomine, Schola Jure-Conſultorum Medica, Relationum libris aliquot comprehenſa, quibus principia Medicinæ in jus tranſſumta ex profeſſa examinantur. Verus autem Auctor & titulus iſte eſt; Fortunati Fidelis de Relationibus Medicorum libri IV. in quibus ea omnia, quæ in forenſibus

☞ RELAND (HADRIAN), one of the moſt learned Writers of the 18th Century [A], was born July the 17th 1676, in the Village of Ryp between Alkmaar and Purmerend in North-Holland. His father John Reland, was Miniſter of that village, whence he afterwards removed to Alkmaar, and at laſt to Amſterdam. It was in this laſt city that young Reland was ſent to ſchool, and at eleven years of age having paſſed through the uſual courſe of ſtudies there, was placed in the College of Amſterdam under Peter Francius and William Surenhuſius; and during the three years, which he ſtudied under theſe Profeſſors, made a vaſt progreſs in the Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, and Arabic languages; and at his leiſure hours applied himſelf to poetry, in which he had great ſucceſs (a). At fourteen years of age he was ſent to Utrecht, where he ſtudied under Grævius and Leuſden, perfected himſelf in the knowledge of the Latin and Oriental tongues, and applied himſelf likewiſe to philoſophy, in which he took the Degree of Doctor. At ſeventeen years of age he began to ſtudy Divinity under Melchior Leidekker, Gerard van Maſtricht, Herman Witzius, and Herman van Halen, and maintained ſeveral Theſes with great applauſe. He did not however abandon the Oriental languages, which were always his favourite ſtudy. Mr. Henry Syke of Bremen, who was extremely well ſkilled in the Arabic, was then at Utrecht; and Mr. Reland made uſe of that opportunity to make himſelf a complete maſter of that language. After he had reſided ſix years at Utrecht, his father ſent him to Leyden, to continue his divinity-ſtudies under Spanheim, Trigland, and Marck; and he went through a courſe of experimental philoſophy under Walferd Senguerd (b). Soon after he came to Leyden he was offered a Profeſſorſhip at Linden, either in Philoſophy or the Oriental languages; and he would have accepted it, though he was then but juſt two and twenty years old, if he had not been prevented by his father's ill ſtate of health, which would not allow him to remove to ſo great a diſtance from Amſterdam. At that the Earl of Portland was deſirous of having him for a tutor to his ſon, the Viſcount Woodſtock. Mr. Reland's father, at the requeſt of his friends, gave him leave to accept of this place; but when it was expected that he ſhould accompany his pupil into England, his friends would not conſent. Some time after (in 1699) he was invited to be Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Harderwik, though he was then but twenty four years old. But that Univerſity did not enjoy him long; for King William having recommended him to the Magiſtrates of Utrecht, he was offered the Profeſſorſhip of the Oriental Languages and Eccleſiaſtical Antiquities; and his genius being more inclined to polite learning than philoſophy, he readily accepted the place, which

(a) Joſephi Serrurier, Oratio Funebris in Obitum Viri Celeberrimi Hadriani Relandi, recitata ipſis Nonis Martiis 1718. p. 8——12. edit. Trajecti ad Rhenum 1718, in 4to.

(b) Idem, p. 12—19.

ac publicis cauſis Medici referre ſolent, pleniſſimè traduntur, ſtudio D. Pauli Ammanni, Lipſiæ 1674. Hoc indicare volui, ne Vir C L. præter meritum Plagiariis adſcribatur (29). Witte forgot one eſſential circumſtance, viz. that the work entitled Fortunati Fidelis, &c. was printed at Paris in 1602 in 4to (30). This edition is quoted in the Lindenius Renovatus, pag. 275, under the name of Fortunatus Fidelis; but he did not know that the Schola Juriſconſultorum, &c. printed at Leipſic in 1679, is the ſame as that of Fortunatus Fidelis, it being aſcribed to Reineſius, pag. 1023. I fancy that the Leipſic edition of 1674 differs from that of 1679 only in the title; and that not meeting with any purchaſers, the bookſellers put Reineſius's name to it, to put it off (31).

(29) Witte, in Diario Biographico, ad ann. 1667, folio Yyy 3.

(30) I found this by a Letter of Bourdelot, firſt Phyſician to the Ducheſs of Burgundy.

(31) Compare this with citat. (3) of the art. PINEAU.

[A] One of the moſt learned writers in the XVIIIth century.] His writings are as follow: I. Notæ ad Othonis Hiſtoriam Doctorum Miſchnicorum. Our author was a Student at Leyden, when he wrote this work, but he did not prefix his name to it. II. Galatea, Luſus Poeticus. This piece was printed in 1701 at Amſterdam in 8vo, without the knowlege of the Author, and reprinted in 1710, and a third edition of it was publiſhed at Utrecht in 1718. Though it is a ſmall piece, it ſhews what might have been expected from him, if he had continued his application to Poetry. III. Remarques ſur les Vies des Poëtes Grecs en abregé. Amſterdam 1700 in 8vo. Theſe are notes, which he added to Tannegui le Fevre's lives of the Greek Poets for the uſe of the Viſcount Woodſtock his pupil. IV. Ode in Poeſim Lucretianam: printed at the end of the preceding book. V. Oratio de incremento, quod Philoſophia cepit hoc ſæculo, dicta publicè ad diem VII. iduum Octobris 1690, cum Philoſophiæ docendæ provinciam ſuſciperet. Amſterdam 1700 in 4to. VIII. Oratio pro Linguâ Perſicâ & cognatis literis Orientalibus, dicta. IX. Kalend. Mart. 1701. cum Linguarum Orientalium Profeſſionem Ordinariam in Academiâ Ultrajectinâ ſuſciperet. Utrecht 1701 in 4to. VII. Analecta Rabbinica, in quibus continentur Gilberti Genebrardi Iſagoge Rabbinica; Chriſt. Cellarii Rabbiniſmus, inſtitutio Grammatica; Druſii de particulis Chaldaicis, Syriacis, & Rabbinicis; Index Commentariorum Rabbinicorum; Bartolocci Vitæ celebriorum Rabbinorum; denique D. Kimchi in decem primos pſalmos Davidis Commentarius. Utrecht 1702 in 8vo. VIII. Diſſertationes quinque de nummis veterum Hebræorum, qui ab inſcriptarum literarum formâ Samaritani appellantur. Accedit Diſſertatio de Marmoribus Arabicis Puteolanis. Utrecht 1709 in 8vo. The firſt of theſe Diſſertations had been already printed in 1701 at Amſterdam in 8vo. and the ſecond and third in 1704. IX. De Religione Muhamedicâ libri duo. Utrecht 1705, in 8vo. The ſecond edition with great additions was printed at Utrecht 1717 in 8vo. This book contains in the firſt book a ſhort account of the faith of the Mahometans tranſlated from an Arabian manuſcript; and in the ſecond the accuſations and reproaches falſely caſt upon them. The firſt edition was tranſlated into German, but it is very imperfect in compariſon of the ſecond, which has been tranſlated into French with additions, which enhance the merit of this book, though excellent in itſelf. X. Diſſertationum Miſcellanearum Partes tres. Utrecht in 8vo. Theſe three diſſertations were printed at different times; the firſt in 1706; the ſecond in 1707, and the third in 1708. All of them treat of curious Subjects. XI. Oratio in Obitum Pauli Bauldri. Utrecht 1706 in 8vo. XII. Decas Exercitationum Philologicarum de verâ pronuntiatione nominis Jehovah, quarum quinque priores Joannis Druſii, Sixtini Amamæ, Lud. Cappelli, Joann. Buxtorfii, & Jac. Altingii lectionem nominis Jehovah impugnant; poſteriores quinque Nic. Fulleri, Th. Gatakeri ſingulæ, & ternæ Joh. Leuſden tuentur. Utrecht 1707 in 8vo. XIII. Antiquitates ſacræ veterum Hebræorum. Utrecht 1708 in 8vo. Reprinted with conſiderable additions at Utrecht 1712 and Leipſic 1714, and with new additions at Utrecht 1717 in 8vo. This is only a ſhort account of the Jewiſh Antiquities, the firſt edition of which was very imperfect. XIV. Oratio de Galli Cantu Hieroſolymis audito, habita die 26. Martii 1709. Utrecht in 8vo. XV. Enchiridion ſtudioſi Arabicè conſcriptum à Borhaneddino Alzerneuchi, cum duplice verſione Latinâ which was offered him in the year 1701. After he had been two years Profeſſor at Utrecht he married Joanna Catharine, daughter of John Telingius, a man of eminent rank at Zirizee in Zeland; by whom he had one ſon and two daughters, one of whom and the ſon ſurvived him. In 1713 there was eſtabliſhed in England a Society for the advancement of Chriſtian Knowledge, and the year following another for the propagation of the Goſpel in foreign Parts; of both which Societies Reland became a Member. He died [B] of the ſmall pox at Utrecht February 5 1718 in the forty ſecond year of his age. He was a man of an excellent diſpoſition, and of great modeſty and humanity. He had a correſpondence with the moſt eminent ſcholars of his time; as in France with Huetius, Abbé Bignon, Montfaucon, and Monſieur Galland; in Germany with John Albert Fabricius, John Gregory Pritius, John Bernard Menckenius, John Frederic Homberg, Godfrey Olearius, and Job Ludolphus; in Swiſſerland with John Baptiſta Ottius, and John Henry Otho; in Italy with Count Dominico Paſſionеo, Jacomo Vignoli, Antonio Magliabecchi, and Abbé Fontanini; and in England with Ezekiel Spanheim, Joſhua Barnes, and Dr. Richard Bentley.

Latinâ, altera Frederici Roſtgaard, alterâ Abrah. Echellenſis. Utrecht 1709 in 8vo. Mr. Reland only procured a new edition of this work, to which he added a preface. XVI. Elenchus Philologicus, quo præcipua, quæ circa textum & verſiones ſacræ ſcripturæ diſputari inter Philologos ſolent breviter indicantur, in uſum ſtudioſæ Juventutis. Utrecht in 12mo. XVII. Brevis Introductio ad Grammaticam Hebræam Altingianam. Accedit Liber Ruth cum Commentario Rabbinico, & obſervationibus Maſoreticis Hebr. & Lat. Utrecht 1710 in 8vo. XVIII. Epicteti Manuale & ſententiæ, quibus accedunt tabula Cebetis & alia ejuſdem argumenti, Græcè & Latinè. Utrecht 1711 in 4to. Marcus Meibomius had begun the edition of this work, but dying before it was finiſhed, Reland completed it. XIX. Lettre à ſon Excellence Monſeigneur le Comte de Kniphuyſen ſur une piece d'or trouvée ſur ſes Terres. Utrecht 1713 in 8vo. XX. Paleſtina ex monumentis veteribus illuſtrata, & Chartis Geographicis accuratioribus adornata. Utrecht 1714, two tomes in 4to. This is undoubtedly the moſt conſiderable work of our author, though there are ſome places, which ought to be retouched, as he deſigned to have done in a ſecond edition. It was reprinted at Nuremberg 1716 in 4to; but this edition is much inferior to that of Utrecht with reſpect to the paper, character, plates, and correctneſs. XXI. Petri Relandi Juriſconſulti & Judicis Faſti Conſulares ad illuſtrationem Codicis Juſtinianæi & Theodoſiani, ſecundum Rationes temporum digeſti, ad quos appendix additur Adriani Relandi, quâ Faſti ex Cod. MSS. deprompti & Conſules in Pandectis memorati continentur. Utrecht 1715 in 8vo. Reland publiſhed this work of his brother, who was a Magiſtrate at Harlem, and died after he had finiſhed it. XXII. Oratio de uſu antiquitatum ſacrarum. Utrecht in 8vo. XXIII. De ſpoliis Templi Hieroſolymitani in Arcu Titiano Romæ conſpicuis Liber, cum fig. Utrecht 1716 in 8vo. XXIV. The life of Ebn Jokden, in High-dutch, in 8vo. XXV. Diſputatio Philologica de Tryphone Judæo, Juſtini Martyris Antagoniſtâ, in quâ probatur eum à Tarphone diverſum fuiſſe. Publiſhed in the Bibliotheca Bremenſis, Claſſis 1. Faſcic. 2. p. 86. Druſius, Lightfoot and ſeveral other writers after them had aſſerted, that Tarpho, who is ſo often mentioned in the Miſhna, and lived in the time of Juſtin Martyr, was the ſame with Trypho. Reland had been of the ſame opinion; but being convinced, that it was a miſtake, confutes it in this Diſſertation. XXVI. Diſputatio Philologica de uxore Domiſedâ: in Epiſt. ad Titum, cap. 2. v. 5. Publiſhed in the Bibliotheca Bremenſis, Claſſ. 1 Faſcic. 3. p. 314. In this piece he endeavours to ſhew, that the Greek word, which the Vulgate tranſlation has rendered Domûs curam habentes, is falſely tranſlated, and ought to be Domi manentes. XXVII. He publiſhed likewiſe ſeveral maps, particularly of Japan and Perſia.

We ſhall add here a letter of his communicated to us by the Reverend and learned Mr. Joſeph Waſſe, Rector of Aynho in Northamptonſhire.

" Clariſſimo Viro Joſepho Waſio Hadr. Relandus S.

" Codices duos Saluſtii in Angliam rectè perveniſſe ex Literis tuis intelligo; at non ego is ſum, qui " illa encomia merear, quibus me honoras. Non " dubito quin jam acceperis exemplum primæ Partis " Diſſertationum mearum miſcell. Alteram prælo " paro. Verum de Codicibus Voolii deſpero. Ipſe " ante paucos dies obiit magno rei literariæ damno, " & quæ fundi noſtri calamitas eſt, quum bona, quæ " reliquit, non ſufficiant expungendis debitis, & multa lis tum de iis, tum de bonis Parentis ejus nuper " defuncti moveatur, tota ſupellex domeſtica una " cum Bibliothecâ publico ſigillo obſignata eſt, ſic ut " nulli aditus concedatur. Quæ lites forte per annos aliquot protrahentur. Tu tamen mentionem " ejus facere poteris, & collectionis quam poſſedit, " cujus indicem ejus manu ſcriptum tibi miſi, & ſi " velis, epiſtolam, qua tibi illorum uſum conceſſit, " mittam. Fuit Judex & Senator Urbis Amisfurtanæ. Gudianorum Codicum Manuſcriptorum nullus eſt divenditus. Saluta Cl. Bentlejum, Sikium, " Barneſium, & ſi qui alii apud vos me noverint. " Vale, Vir amiciſſime, & me ama. Trajecti ad Rhenum ad XXVII Octob. CIↃICCVI.

" P. S. Markius ille, cujus Codices ſunt, & cujus " mentionem injicies, qualis ſit, Cl. Sikius optimè tibi " dicet. Nomen ei eſt Henricus Hadrianus à Mark, " & laudari poteſt ab inſigni Bibliothecâ, quam poſſidet. Cl. Kuſterus ante triduum heic apud me " fuit, nec ipſe mecum inter pocula tui immemor."

[B] He died.] He wrote the following epitaph for himſelf.

Terra tegit Cineres, quæ cunas præbuit olim,
Principium Curſûs metaque facta mei.
Quiſquis es, incertæ ſtadium decurrere vitæ
Dum licet, ante oculos meta ſit uſque tuos.
Conficitur ſpatium diſpar, verum exitus omnes
Unus, & hac horâ te quoque forte manet.
Ergo vive Deo, præpone æterna caducis,
Atque animi potior ſit tibi cura tui.
Quicquid agis paterisve, tuis Chriſti exprime mores:
Non aliâ fas eſt ſcandere ad Aſtra viâ. T.

REMOND (a) (FLORIMOND DE), Counſellor in the Parliament of Bourdeaux, about the end of the 16th Century, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by ſome books, which he wrote with great animoſity againſt the Proteſtants [A]. He had been a Huguenot in his youth; but if he himſelf may be credited, he was reſcued from the jdws of Hereſy (b) by a miracle, to which

(a) He ſpelt his name Ræmond; but in ſome of his books he calls himſelf Ræmound.

(b) Florimond de Ræmond, Hiſt. de la naiſſance & progres de l'Hereſie, liv. 2. chap. 12. p. m. 204.

[A] He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by ſome books which he wrote with great animoſity againſt the Proteſtants.] He publiſhed a book, entitled, Erreur populaire de la Papeſſe Jeanne, (a vulgar miſtake with regard to Pope Joan). I have the Bourdeaux edition of 1594 before me. The Author puts his name to it, which informs me, that it was not the firſt, the firſt having been anonymous. As I never deſigned, ſays Florimond de Remond (1) to gain any reputation by ſuch inconſiderable productions of my brain, (which would be like attempting to which he himſelf was an eye-witneſs in 1566. Moreri who mentions it, did not know the place where that comedy was acted. He ſays that Nicholas Obri, a native of Vervins, was exorciſed at Loudun (c), in which he is miſtaken, it being at Laon; and I obſerved elſewhere (d) that father Labbe committed the ſame error. There is reaſon to believe that Florimond de Remond ſtudied under Peter Ramus in the College of Prele at Paris. I take notice of this merely that I may have occaſion to mention a thing related by him concerning the book de tribus Impoſtoribus [B]. Boterius has fixed his death to the year 1602 (e), and Moreri under the year 1600. Some people declare that he was not Author of the works which are aſcribed to him [C], the moſt conſiderable of which to build a ſolid glory on ſand) ſo I have endeavoured to keep myſelf from ſhame. This conſideration made me conceal my name, which did not deſerve to be ranked among the many learned men with which France abounds. But ſince that Author has put a quite different interpretation on the laudable fear by which I was reſtrained, I thought proper to draw the curtain, and reveal myſelf to the publick: and yet I will have ſo much favour for him as to ſuppreſs his own, ſince he has made ſuch weak anſwers to my arguments. Thus he ſpeaks of a Miniſter of Bearn (2), who had writ againſt the anonymous piece, entitled, Erreur populaire de la Papeſſe; which prompted the Author to publiſh a ſecond edition of it, carefully reviſed, and undertook a longer and more ſerious work, concerning Anti-chriſt. Vignier declares that he made uſe of the ſecond edition of the Anti-chriſt, and Anti-pope Joan, reviſed, corrected, and enlarged by the Author, and printed at Paris for Abel l'Angelier 1599 (3). He is miſtaken with regard to Anti-Pope Joan; the Paris edition of 1599, being the fourth, at leaſt; one being printed at Lyons, by Benedict Rigaut, in 8vo, anno 1595 (4). Cook is ſtill more miſtaken, ſince he ſays that this work was firſt writ in French in 1602 (5). Mr. Sagittarius takes notice only of the Bourdeaux edition of the ſame year (6). Remond's third work was not publiſhed till after his death; and it is entitled, The Hiſtory of the Birth, Progreſs, and Decay of the Hereſy of this Age; divided into eight Books. The ſixth of theſe eight books, was to contain an account of the ſchiſm (the reformation) of England. But they found only the title of it among his papers; he working rather at the 7th and 8th book which were more neceſſary, becauſe he there ſpoke of France (7). Francis de Remond his ſon, who took care of the impreſſion of that work, and dedicated it to Pope Paul V. ſupplied the 6th book (8). Sagittarius obſerves, that Florimond de Remond, or rather Richeome the Jeſuit, wrote, in three volumes, the hiſtory of the birth, progreſs, and decay of hereſy; and he quotes the French Paris edition of 1605, and that of 1624 (9): but this is not accurate. The edition of 1605, conſiſts but of one volume, and is the only one writ by Remond; the two others being compoſed by Claude Mallingre, Hiſtoriographer of France, and printed at Paris in 1624. This work of Remond, and Mallingre's continuation have been often reprinted (10), both in French and in Latin. The other two works of Remond have alſo been tranſlated into Latin. It is to be obſerved that he publiſhed at Bourdeaux, in 1594, his French verſion of Tertullian's treatiſe de corona militis, and of that father's diſcourſe ad Martyres. It is alſo to be obſerved that Baronius, and ſome other writers of the ſame perſuaſion, beſtow great commendations on his controverſial writings.

(1) p. 303. of his Erreur populaire, Bourdeaux edit. 1594.

(c) Moreri, under the word Florimond de Raymond.

(d) In the art. LOUDUN, rem. [C].

(e) Rodolph. Boterius, Comment. de Rebus in Gallia geſtis, lib. 9. p. 91.

(2) He denotes himſelf only by theſe letters, R. T.

(3) Vignier, Theatre de l'Anti-chriſt, in the Index of Authors.

(4) Blondel made uſe of this, where he takes notice in his Examen Quæſt. de Papa fœmina, of Florimond de Remond's errors.

(5) Cook's treatiſe upon Pope Joan.

(6) Sagittar. Introduct. in Hiſt. Eccleſ. p. 683.

(7) See the preface to the Hiſt. of the birth, &c. of Hereſy.

(8) I was obliged to work hard, and to write very faſt, in order to get it publiſhed as ſoon as poſſible. Ibid.

(9) Sagittar. Introduct. in Hiſt. Eccleſ. p. 820.

(10) I make uſe of the Roan edit. of 1648.

[B] A thing related by him, concerning the book de tribus Impoſtoribus.] "Have we not ſeen a deteſtable "book forged in Germany (though printed in ano- "ther country) at the ſame time that hereſy played "its part in this manner, which ſpread this doctrine, "with the following horrid title, Of the three Im- "poſtors, &c. ridiculing the three chief Religions, "which alone acknowledge the true God, the Jewiſh, "Chriſtian, and Mahomedan. The title only ſhew- "ed that it came from hell; and what that age muſt "be which was to give birth to ſo formidable a "monſter. I ſhould not have made the leaſt men- "tion of it, had not Hoſius and Genebrard ſpoke "of it before. I remember, when I was a boy, to "have ſeen the copy of it in the College of Prele, "in the hands of Ramus, a man pretty conſpicuous "for the greatneſs and eminence of his learning; "who confounded himſelf amid ſeveral reſearches "into the ſecrets of Religion, which he uſed to "ſtudy at the ſame time with Philoſophy. This "wicked book was handed about among the moſt "learned men, who were deſirous of ſeeing it (11)." Theſe are Florimond de Remond's words. Had he known that this wicked book was ſpoke of under the reign of Frederic II (12), would he have preſumed to aſcribe, to the XVIth century, the production of ſuch a monſter? Perhaps he would; his only view being to make the Lutheran principles odious per fas & nefas. Moſt perſons father the pretended book de tribus Impoſtoribus upon Aretin (13); and conſequently they charge it upon Italy, and not Germany.

(11) Remond, Hiſt. of the birth of hereſy, book 2. chap. 16. p. m. 236.

(12) See the art. ARETIN (Peter) rem. [G].

(13) See the ſame rem.

[C] Some people declare, that he was not Author of the books which are aſcribed to him.] Let us go back a little. Sagittarius, in a work printed in 1694, furniſhes me with two paſſages. Florimundus Ræmundus, Vaſco, ſenator parlamenti Burdegalenſis, ſub cujus nomine Ludovicus Richeomus, Jeſuitici Sodalitii Theologus, Gallice ſcripſit Errorem popularem de Johanna Pſeudo-pontifice, dicta Papiſſa, Latine poſtea verſum, (14). This is what he ſays in page 683. See alſo what he ſays in page 820. Florimundus Ræmundus ſive potius cujus ſtylo uſus eſt, Ludovicus Richeomius Soc. J. qui de ortu, progreſſu, & interitu hæreticorum hujus temporis, Tomis III. commentatus eſt. I now proceed to a book printed in 1688. "It has been "doubted whether the books that paſs under Flo- "rimond's name, were really writ by him. Many "perſons ſay that father Richeome a Jeſuit was Au- "thor of them; and that he borrowed the name of "a Counſellor of the Parliament of Bourdeaux, to "give them the more credit. Perhaps it was thought "proper to oppoſe to Thuanus, whoſe ſincerity did "not ſuit with the Jeſuits, a Writer of ſome repu- "tation. Peter Matthieu ſays poſitively in his Hiſ- "tory, that it was thought father Richeome was "Author of the books that paſs under the name of "Florimond de Remond. Vignier in his Theatre "of Anti-Chriſt; and Rivetus in his anſwer to the "Jeſuit ſay the ſame; and thoſe Authors wrote a "little time after that Florimond's books had "been publiſhed. Blondel was alſo of this opinion "(15)." Theſe are the words of a Doctor, who is now an illuſtrious Prelate in England. It is certain that the following words are found in a work of Vignier. Matthieu, Hiſtoriographer to the King, in ſome part of the Hiſtory of his Majeſty is of opinion that the book of Anti-Chriſt was writ by Richeome the Jeſuit, and not by the ſaid Remond (26). It is no leſs certain that Rivetus, having related what Florimond de Remond acknowledges in praiſe of Calvin, in his hiſtory of the birth of Hereſy, adds as follows (27). I was willing to introduce here this relation of an enemy (and perhaps of Richeome the Jeſuit, to whom Peter Matthieu aſcribes Remond's Anti-Chriſt). I have found the paſſage of Peter Matthieu on which this is grounded, and it is as follows. "The aſſembly opened with "declaring that the Biſhop of Rome was the Anti- "Chriſt, foretold by the word of God. The Pro- "teſtant Clergy have long ſince preached this, and "the Romiſh Doctors the contrary. Florimond de "Remond, or as I believe, Richeome the Jeſuit "under that name, has writ on this ſubject more "than any body; and collected, by way of Anti- "theſis, whatever belongs to the true and the fabulous "Anti-Chriſt (18)." I leave the reader to judge, whether this be a foundation ſolid enough to eſtabliſh, as a fact, that all the controverſial writings that were publiſhed under the name of Florimond de Remond,

(14) Sagittar. Introduct. in Hiſt. Eccleſ. p. 683.

(15) Burnet, Defence of the reflexions on Varillas.

(16) Nicholas Vignier, Theatre de l'Anti-chriſt, in the table of the Authors. I make uſe of the Geneva edit. of 1613, 8vo, before which (in 1610) the folio edition was publiſhed.

(17) Rivet, Sommaire des Controverſes (it is an anſwer to the controverſial catechiſm, publiſhed by Will. Baile, the Jeſuit) p. 16. of the 2d edit. which is of Geneva, 1609, 8vo.

(18) Matthieu, Hiſt. de Henry IV. liv. 6. Narration 5. p. m. 628. ſpeaking of the national Synod of Gap.

which is the History of the birth, progreſs, and decay of the hereſy of this age. No Writer could be leſs qualified than he was to ſucceed in this work [D], becauſe of the hatred he bore againſt the religion wherein he had been brought up; and which, as he pretended, Remond, were writ by Richeome. But here follows another teſtimony of one of the Authors who refuted father Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm. I am far from giving any credit, ſays he (19), to Florimond de Remond, having heard from a Counſellor of Bourdeaux, one Lewis de Maſſip (a man of probity, and with whom I had contracted an intimate friendſhip, having lodged at his houſe in Bourdeaux in 1650, where I attended on the Court; and having correſponded with him by letter, during ſome years) that it was a conſtant tradition in this country, that Remond, who had been a Member of their Parliament, had, when living, enjoyed there very conſiderable and remarkable advantages: 1. To grow old without being gray hair'd: 2. To build without money: 3. To have writ without having any learning; the Jeſuits having furniſhed and ſuggeſted to him all he has ſtuffed into his hiſtory of the birth and decay of hereſy.

(19) John Baptiſt de Rocolles, Hiſt. veritable du Calviniſme, p. 285.

QUALITIES requiſite in an Hiſtorian.

[D] No man could be leſs qualified than he was to ſucceed in ſuch a work.] Hiſtory, generally ſpeaking, is either the moſt difficult kind of compoſition an Author can undertake, or one of the moſt difficult. It requires a man of great judgment, a noble, clear, and conciſe ſtyle: a juſt conſcience, a perfect rectitude of mind; a great number of excellent materials, and the art of diſpoſing them with propriety; and eſpecially a ſtrength of mind that may enable him to reſiſt the inſtinct of religious zeal, which prompts perſons to exclaim againſt what they judge to be falſe, and to embelliſh what they imagine to be true. By this ſhort and very juſt deſcription of the talents which form the character of a good Hiſtorian, one may eaſily perceive that Florimond de Remond was not qualified to ſucceed in writing a hiſtory of the birth and progreſs of Lutheraniſm and Calviniſm. This was the ſubject of one of the greateſt revolutions that happened in the Chriſtian world. State reaſons had crept into it, and were combined with the intereſts of religion. This formed a mixture, which heightened the labour of the Hiſtorian, required a ſtrong application, and a great freedom from prejudice. I do not enquire whether our Remond was ſufficiently qualified as to learning, judgment, genius, and beauty of ſtyle, to treat in a proper manner ſo important a ſubject as this; and I will take it for granted, that, in this reſpect, he was infinitely leſs contemptible than his cenſors ſuppoſe him: but then, had he had no other imperfections than thoſe which his zeal for the Romiſh Religion, and his hatred to that of the Proteſtants, produced in him, he ought to have perceived that he was going to engage in a work that was above his ſtrength. He ſtumbled in the threſhold; he imitated thoſe, who attempt to build a houſe before they calculate the expence, to ſee whether they ſhall be able to ſupport it (20). He neglected the precept, which the greateſt maſters have ſo wiſely recommended, viz. to chooſe a ſubject proportionate to their abilities, and to make a long time trial of themſelves on the meaſure of that proportion.

(20) St. Luke, chap. xiv. 28.

Sumite materiam veſtris, qui ſcribitis, æquam
Viribus, & verſate diu, quid ferre recuſent
Quid valeant humeri (21).

(21) Horat. de Arte Poetic. ver. 38.

" Let Poets match their ſubject to their ſtrength,
" And often try what weight they can ſupport,
" And what their ſhoulders are too weak to bear.
Lord ROSCOMMON.

The chief thing he ought to have been careful about, was the examining his conſcience thoroughly, and probably this is what he neglected moſt. He was not leſs ſolicitous about any thing, than to ſound his own heart, and to enquire of himſelf very ſeriouſly, Shall I be able to prevail upon myſelf to write truths, that would be diſadvantegeous to the Romiſh Religion, and advantageous to the Huguenots? I am odious to them, and they are ſo to me. They have uſed me ill, and I have treated them after the ſame manner. I have writ controverſial pieces which they refuted, and I replied: ſhall I have ſtrength of mind enough not to yield in any manner to paſſion, to zeal, to reſentment, to the intereſt of my cauſe, and never tell an untruth out of partiality to ſo many ſubjects which affect me ſtrongly (22)? Thoſe who have read with ſome attention, his work, may ſay, without being thought raſh, that he did not queſtion himſelf on that head, or that he did not follow the dictates of his conſcience. He throws, into the ſcale of the Proteſtants injuſtice of every kind; and in the other ſcale, wiſdom and innocence of every kind. He relates very few things without employing injurious epithets, and outragious words againſt hereſy and hereticks. His citations are very inſignificant; he alledging either perſons of his own party, with moſt of whom he had either had perſonal diſputes (23) with the Proteſtant Miniſters; or he alledges Proteſtants as he had found their paſſages in the writings of thoſe Romaniſts. It is impoſſible but that an hiſtorian who acts in this manner muſt be either a ſlave to pious frauds, or deluded by himſelf, and conſequently the worſt qualified of all men to write a hiſtory of the birth and progreſs of the Proteſtant Religion, and the moſt apt to tranſgreſs the two great laws of his profeſſion (24); there being ſome falſities, he does not ſcruple to publiſh, and ſome truths he does not dare to divulge. He could not ſet about this hiſtory without wanting the admonition given to Phaeton.

(22) See rem. [L] of the art. TIMÆUS.

(23) i. e. verbal diſputes, or in writing.

Magna petis, Phaëton, & quæ non viribus iſtis
Munera conveniunt, nec tam puerilibus annis (25).

" Too vaſt and hazardous the taſk appears,
" Nor ſuited to thy ſtrength, nor to thy years.
ADDISON.

(24) Quis neſcit primam eſſe Hiſtoriæ legem, ne quid falſi dicere audeat, deinde ne quid veri non audeat, ne qua ſuſpicio gratiæ ſit in ſcribendo, ne qua ſimultatis? Cicero, de Orat. lib. 2. folio m. 74, A.

(25) Ovid. Metam. lib. 2. ver. 54.

I know ſome perſons, who wiſh there were hiſtories of that important revolution, which might not be compoſed either by a Roman Catholic or a Proteſtant. They imagine that party intereſt, and a zeal for the cauſe to which a Writer is attached, and much more, a hatred for the oppoſite religion, engage a Writer to amplify, ſuppreſs, extenuate, or diſguiſe things, according as they may either ſerve or injure the honour of his party. They therefore wiſh that Thucydides, or a Livy, could have given us the hiſtory of the events, which Florimond de Remond promiſes in the title of his work. They would wiſh for the pens of thoſe illuſtrious hiſtorians, not ſo much on account of their eloquence and good ſenſe, as becauſe they were heathens; and could have been neuter with regard to the various ſects into which the Chriſtian world is divided; ſo that they would have related, without partiality, the good and bad of the conduct of the Papiſts, Lutherans, and Calviniſts. However, I do not know whether it would have been poſſible for them to have obſerved a perfect neutrality; for as Popery is more conformable to Paganiſm than the Proteſtant Religion, they might have been prejudiced againſt Luther and Calvin. It is impoſſible for a hiſtorian to be too much upon his guard, and it is ſcarce poſſible for him to eſcape the ſnares of prejudice. There are ſome forms of government, ſome maxims of morality and politicks, which pleaſe or diſpleaſe him. This prejudice prompts him to favour one party more than another, even where he writes the hiſtory of an ancient people, or of a far diſtant country. Suppoſe that a man of this age was to draw up the hiſtory of a King of India, who had been dethroned two or three hundred years ago, one would conclude that no intereſt could prompt him to write with inſincerity; nevertheleſs, if he is an enemy to monarchy, and one who approves of the rebellions of ſubjects, he will ſearch for a thouſand ſhifts and diſguiſes, to throw an odium on the memory of that Monarch, and juſtify the civil wars which occaſioned his being dethroned. An hiſtorian, who was an enemy to rebellion, would act the counterpart of the former. This is the reaſon why we have ſo few hiſtories writ in which pretended, a miracle had obliged him to forſake. But how bad ſoever this hiſtory may be, a great number of other Authors borrow from it (f). It is very ſurprizing to find, in many books, ſome very remarkable and important incidents, which did not refer to authentic records, but to the teſtimony of Florimond de Remond. Some relate that he did not diſcharge, in a juſt manner, the functions of the employment he had in the Parliament of Bourdeaux [E]; the Proteſtants accuſing him of believing with extreme partiality which the naked truth appears; or that are free from ſome marks of the hiſtorian's anger or diſcontent, or from ſome ſatyrical ſtrokes againſt living perſons. Theſe he introduces in the Indian Hiſtory he is writing. All readers do not gueſs who it is he aims at: but ſome do, and he is ſenſible that ſome will do this. Hence the reader may judge how much we ought to be upon our guard with reſpect to modern hiſtorians, ſince Livy himſelf, becauſe of a certain general conformity, could not be totally impartial between the Proteſtants and Romaniſts. The beſt advice that could have been given to Florimond de Remond, would have been for him to continue to write controverſial pieces, in which paſſion is allowed; and not to ſet up for an hiſtorian, an employment that no ways became ſo zealous a Catholic as himſelf, and that he ſhould leave this to lukewarm and indifferent perſons. I alſo believe that it would be proper to adviſe a zealous Huguenot, never to undertake to write the hiſtory of Calviniſm, of Lutheraniſm, of the edict of Nantz, nor any of that kind. You are exaſperated, (ſhould it be ſaid to him) you harbour an animoſity againſt the perſecutors, you are fired with an ardent zeal for your cauſe; you would give us not a hiſtory, but an advocate's plea; you would only blame your adverſe party, and applaud or juſtify your own: now you could not do this without committing ſome little errors either of omiſſion or commiſſion. Set yourſelf therefore about ſome other book, in caſe that you deſire your pens ſhould be of any emolument to the publick.

(f) See the rem. [Y] of the art. OCHINUS.

But here follows a new reaſon why ſo few people are capable of writing a good hiſtory. Thoſe, who could be capable of ſurmounting all prejudices, and to reject all artifices in hiſtory-writing, could not manifeſt all their candour, and be entirely impartial, without expoſing themſelves to the indignation of the people, (the word people is of great extent, and comprehends many perſons of rank and title) they would cauſe themſelves to be conſidered as falſe brethren, prevaricators and perfidious men. Had not Popeliniere like to have had his brains daſhed out, for relating certain particulars, in his hiſtory of the troubles under Charles IX. in a different manner from what it was thought he ought to have told them in? I ſhall ſpeak of this in his article in the ſupplement to this dictionary. Many perſons wiſh that an Hiſtorian of their party would imitate perſons that play at piquet, who keep only the good cards, and throw out the bad ones.

The reaſon why I ſaid that probity ought to be one of the characteriſticks of an Hiſtorian.

The Reader will perhaps wonder at my ſaying, that rectitude of mind, and a perfect probity, are neceſſary qualities for an Hiſtorian; and it may be objected, that an ingenious man, without poſſeſſing thoſe qualities, may write a good hiſtory, in the ſame manner as he may a good oration or a good tragedy. I therefore will make good my aſſertion. For this purpoſe I ſhall obſerve, that truth being the ſoul of hiſtory, it is eſſentially neceſſary with regard to hiſtory, that no falſity be introduced into it; and therefore though it ſhould boaſt every other perfection, it would not be a hiſtory, but a fiction and a romance, in caſe truth has not been obſerved in it. But it is not ſo with reſpect to a piece of poetry or eloquence. I conclude from thence, that a perſon, in order for his being qualified to write a good hiſtory, muſt have a conſcience ſo abhorrent to faſhood, that it muſt not allow him to tell a lie, though it were even to the advantage of his religion, his beſt beloved friends, nor to the diſadvantage of an impious ſect, or of his moſt implacable perſecutors. I underſtand by falſhood or lying, not only the entire invention of a falſe tranſaction, but likewiſe the ſuppreſſion or addition of certain circumſtances which may ſerve to juſtify perſons, or lay ſome things to their charge. Thoſe who are not endued with this rectitude of mind, this perfect probity, commit a fraud as Hiſtorians, ſometimes to ingratiate themſelves with perſons who might do them ſervice; and, at other times, to prevent their diſobliging others who might be an obſtacle in their way to poſts and preferments. What has been ſaid (26) of an Orator, is ſtill more requiſite in an Hiſtorian, who ought to be defined, vir bonus narrandi peritus, i. e. "a good man, who is ſkilful in "relating tranſactions," and nevertheleſs, we ſcarce hear any perſon enquire, whether the Author of a hiſtory is a good man. People only aſk whether he is a man of genius and judgment? Whether his ſtyle be beautiful, and if he affects his Readers? and according to the anſwers they receive on theſe occaſions, they either buy the book or leave it. However, they ought at leaſt to imitate thoſe, who, enquiring the character of witneſſes, began with their riches, and ended with their manners (27).

(26) Citat. (203) of the art. PERICLES.

Protinus ad cenſum, de moribus ultima fiet
Quæſtio: quot paſcit ſervos, quot poſſidet agri
Jugera, quam multa magnaque paropſide cænat (28)?

"The queſtion is not put, how far extends "His piety, but what he yearly ſpends:
"Quick to the bus'neſs; how he lives and eats;
"How largely gives; how ſplendidly he treats;
"How many thouſand acres feed his ſheep,
"What are his rents, what ſervants does he
"keep? Dryden.

(27) It is uſual to ſay, to denote a covetous age, that a father who looks out for a wife for his ſon, firſt asks whether a young woman is rich; ſecondly, if ſhe is handſom; and laſtly, if ſhe be virtuous.

(28) Juven. ſat. 3. ver. 140.

In fine, a perſon ought to aſk, whether the Author is an honeſt man. Mr. * * * makes that his firſt queſtion, when a Bookſeller ſhews him a new voyage, Memoirs of ſuch a one, &c. The Bookſeller ſaying to him, this is a very curious book; it is finely writ, and ſells extremely well: but do you know the Author of it, ſays he? Is he vain and ambitious? Does he love pleaſure? Could he dreſs himſelf handſomly without drawing three or four hundred crowns from his Bookſeller? I ſhould be glad to know all this firſt; for the Author of a relation, if he be a vain man, and wants to ſell his copy at a high price, blends it with any falſhoods that may give a favourable idea of the Writer, and divert the Reader?

[E] Some ſay that he did not diſcharge, in a juſt manner, the functions of the employment he had in the Parliament of Bourdeaux.] Conſult Dr. Burnet's defence of the reflexions on Varillas, where the following paſſage is read. Florimond de Remond was as little eſteemed in his judicial capacity, as in that of a Writer; and the judgment that has been paſt upon him, is no leſs diſadvantageous than whimſical: Judicat ſine conſcientia, libros ſcribit ſine ſcientia, & ædificat ſine pecunia, i. e. "He "judges without conſcience, he writes without know-"ledge, and builds without money (29)." If the Reader looks into the laſt pages of the French edition, he will there find the extract of a letter (α), with a preamble that is very worthy of being copied. Here follows both of them: Such heavy complaints were made of his malice and injuſtice towards the Proteſtants, in his life-time, that his account concerning them ought not to be credited. The tranſition, from an unjuſt Judge to a partial Hiſtorian, is very eaſy; and a perſon muſt even be more hard-hearted, to commit an unjuſt action in quality of a Judge, than to write a falſity in quality of an Hiſtorian. But here follows the extract in queſtion (30).

(29) Burnet's Defence of the reflections on Varillas, p. 28.

(30) Ibid. p. 146, 147.

"There is a book entitled, Plaintes des Egliſes Ré-
"formées au Roi, ſur pluſieurs injuſtices qui leur
"ſont faites. (The complaint of the Proteſtant
"churches to the King, concerning the injuſtice, of "various kinds, they have ſuffered). It is an anony-
"mous book, and was printed in 1597. Complaint is
"there made, among other particulars, that the ſieur
"Florimond de Remond, who, during the commotions in
"1572, having been taken, as he was travelling, by a
"party of the Proteſtants, who forced him to pay a

(g) See the rem. [E].

tiality againſt them (g). Varillas was a little mortified, when he was obliged to own that he had copied from that Author [F].

" thouſand livres for his ranſom, took every opportunity,
" from that time, to reimburſe himſelf, and was paid
" that ſum ten or twelve times over, as he himſelf boaſt-
" ed. Being afterwards appointed to report the caſe
" of a Proteſtant widow, whoſe huſband had been killed
" in cool blood by a Roman-catholick, he gave the crimi-
" nal an opportunity of eſcaping, by which means the mur-
" ther remained unpuniſhed. We alſo find, about the end
" of the book in queſtion, that a Proteſtant maiden having
" been buried in the church-yard belonging to the Ro-
" man-catholicks in Bourdeaux, an order was publiſhed,
" at the requeſt of the Sieur de Raymond, commanding to
" dig up the body of this young woman, and throw it
" into the fields, with all the bodies of the Proteſtants
" that had been buried there within ten years (31).

(31) See Notes ſur la Confeſſion de Sanci, p. 444, and it will appear that the extract ſent to Dr. Burnet was not quite correct.

§ (a) This letter written from Paris in 1688, by the Author of the Notes on the Confeſſion of Sanci, was addreſſed to Mr. Jurieu. Some time after, he ſent him the piece itſelf, to rectify thereby ſome inaccuracies which had crept into that letter, for want of having that piece before him when he was writing. See the rem. on the Confeſſion of Sanci, p. 443, of the 2d edition. REM. CRIT.

[F] Varillas was a little mortified, when he was obliged to own, that he had copied from that Author.] Dr. Burnet criticiſed him (32), for denying that the Prince of Wales's (33) marriage, with the Infanta of Spain had been conſummated; and he repreſented to him, that he might have impoſed the more eaſily upon his Readers, had he quoted, in the margin, ſome letter or relation; or had he feigned, according to his uſual cuſtom, that proofs might be found with regard to what he aſſerted. In his anſwer are the following words, among others; that though he had poſitively affirmed that this marriage was not conſummated, he would not have been the inventor of that circumſtance; and that he could alledge a good authority for this (34); and who ſhould this authority be, but Florimond de Remond? Varillas declares, that the Engliſh, German, Italian and Spaniſh Authors, had wrote with ſo much partiality on the ſchiſm (reformation) of Henry VIII. that he had been obliged to have recourſe to a French Author, and that Florimond de Remond was pitched upon for this purpoſe. He was a Counſellor in the Parliament of Bourdeaux; had a wife and children, and was not induced by any motive to corrupt the truth. The Calviniſts were, in his time, in the height of their power; he had no reaſon to be diſſatisfied with them; and he ſpent ſo many years in writing his hiſtory of the birth, progreſs and decay of Hereſy, that he died before it was printed. His children took care to have it printed, and the publick beſtowed great applauſes on it. It has born ſeveral impreſſions; and as, during fourſcore years, (for ſo long it has been publiſhed) no Proteſtant ſeems to have attempted to refute it, any more than the book concerning Antichriſt and Pope Joan, written by the ſame Author, I had reaſon to believe, that if they did not approve it, it was at leaſt indifferent to them (35). Dr. Burnet eaſily invalidated the authority of this teſtimony; he obſerving, that Florimond de Remond lived at a conſiderable diſtance from England, and the knowledge of what was tranſacted in that country (36); and that, as appears from every period in his hiſtory, he bore ſo much hatred to the reformation, that this circumſtance alone may juſtly prejudice any perſon againſt every thing he ſays concerning it . . . . farther, that part of the hiſtory which relates to England, was not writ by him (37), as is expreſsly declared in the preface; and his ſon ſeems to aſcribe the honour of it to himſelf. Nay, it is very much doubted, whether he wrote the whole work, and if we are not to aſcribe it to Richeome the Jeſuit. He adds (38), that Florimond de Remond was never conſidered, in France, as an Author who deſerved to be ranked among the Hiſtorians, either in point of judgment or ſincerity; and that he was conſidered as an unjuſt Judge. Mr. Varillas, continues he, would poſſibly have made a great clamour a year ago, as the higheſt injury that could have been done him, had he been accuſed of tranſcribing from ſo bad an Author, and of being merely his echo. But he is now glad to have recourſe to ſo poor a ſhift; for which he nevertheleſs was ſo ſtrongly cenſured in Paris, that it perhaps would be treating him with too much ſeverity, to inſiſt any farther on this matter. He ridicules him for obſerving, that Florimond de Remond had a wife and children. It is not very eaſy to ſee, ſays Dr. Burnet (39), in what the ſtrength of this argument conſiſts; but indeed a perſon muſt ſoar above the vulgar, to be affected with Mr. Varillas's ſublime eloquence. If a man, in order to his being a good author, muſt have a wife and children, we may conclude that Mr. Varillas has neither. Here we have a new argument for the marriage of Prieſts, which no one ever thought of before. But I muſt confeſs that, for a perſon of a vulgar capacity as I am, I cannot comprehend why this ſhould have made Florimond de Remond a good author, and not Thuanus. The Critic, at the concluſion of the book, tells him of the complaints which the Proteſtants made with regard to the furious animoſity which Florimond de Remond vented againſt them (40); which circumſtance alone might prejudice him in writing their hiſtory; not to mention that he remembered he had been their priſoner, and had been obliged to pay a ranſom: is it therefore not ſhameful for Varillas to aſſert, that he had no reaſon to be diſſatisfied with them? But if ever writer ought to bluſh, to have no other authority to alledge but that of this Magiſtrate of Bourdeaux, in relating the hiſtory of the ſchiſm (reformation) of England; it is particularly a prodigious ſhame to Varillas, he who ſet up for a writer who drew, from the moſt curious, authentic, and ſecret manuſcripts, anecdotes, thoſe pure and little known ſources of truth.

(32) Burnet's Reflexions on the ninth book of Varillas, p. 41.

(33) Arthur, ſon to Henry VII.

(34) Varillas, Reponſe à la Critique de Mr. Burnet, p. m. 97.

(35) Ibid. p. 98.

(36) Burnet, Defence of the Reflections, p. 24.

(37) Burnet, ibid. p. 25.

(38) Idem, ibid. p. 28.

(39) Idem, ibid. p. 39.

(40) I have given that paſſage from Dr. Burnet, citat. 31.

I muſt obſerve that one falſity in Varillas was ſuffered to paſs uncenſured. He affirms that the books concerning Anti-chriſt and Pope Joan, wrote by Florimond de Remond, were never refuted; but he would have found the contrary, had he caſt an eye on the title of Theatre de l'Anti-chriſt (41), and the dialogue of Alexander Cook (42). But it alſo muſt be obſerved, that the reaſon he alledges, grounded on his being a married man, is not a contemptible one; for it is more natural to ſuppoſe, that a layman was not guided by prejudice, in writing the hiſtory of the enemies to his Church, as it is natural to expect ſuch a thing from a Miniſter. Varillas might therefore have ſuppoſed, that Florimond de Remond was leſs to be ſuſpected than a Frier or a Prieſt. I own that this reaſon is equally good with regard to Thuanus; but as he did not write any thing on the ſchiſm made by Henry VIII, could Varillas have made uſe of him? This author might conſequently have defended himſelf as to that particular.

(41) Written by Nicholas Vignier, a Proteſtant Miniſter, and printed in 1610. A book alſo was publiſhed, entitled, l'Anti chriſt Romain, (the Roman Anti-chriſt) in which our Remond was refuted.

(42) It was tranſlated out of Engliſh into French, by John de la Montagne.

(a) See the dedication to the French tranſlation of his works.

(b) See his preface.

RENOU (JOHN), in Latin Renodæus, Counſellor and Phyſician in Paris about the beginning of the 17th Century, was a Norman (a). He was particularly well ſkilled in Pharmacy, as appears from the pieces he compoſed in Latin [A], and which Lewis de Serres tranſlated into French. The tranſlator (b) declares that he was as much ſuperior in this part of phyſick to Fernelius and Sylvius, and all who had hitherto writ on that ſubject,

[A] The pieces he compoſed in Latin.] Here follow the titles of them: Diſpenſatorium Galeno-Chymicum continens Inſtitutionum Pharmaceuticarum libros V; De Materia Medica libros III; & Antidotarium varium & abſolutiſſimum Mention is made in Lindenius renovatus (1), of the Paris editions 1608, and 1623, 4to; that of Frankfort 1609, 8vo; that of Hanau 1631, 4to; and that of Geneva, reviſed by Peter Uffenbach, and enlarged with ſome pieces 1631, 8vo. But the Frankfort edition of 1615, from which Lewis de Serres made his firſt tranſlation, is omitted. He afterwards was informed that the author had made ſubject, as Fernelius and Sylvius ſurpaſs Mirepſus and Præpoſitus. One eaſily perceives that John de Renou was not a friend to la Riviere, Phyſician to Henry IV. he not ſcrupling to call him even a quack (c). I obſerved, that he rejects a great number of popular errors with reſpect to the virtue of plants, minerals, &c. but he ſometimes gives quarter to very childiſh traditions [B]. He criticiſed ſomewhat in Bauderon's diſpenſatory (d), which gave occaſion to his being called plagiary; the ſon of the Author who was cenſured, aſſerting, that John de Renou had enriched his antidotary with a vaſt number of thefts from the diſpenſatory of the late Mr. Bauderon his father (e); but Renou anſwered, that the charge was equally falſe and ridiculous (f).

(1) p. 666. edit. of 1686.

(c) Renou, liv. 3. de la Matiere Medicinale, chap. 34. p. m. 465.

(d) Renou, liv. 4. de l'Antidotaire, chap. 6. p. 739.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Ibid.

made his work one third larger in the Paris edition of 1623; which ſupplement he alſo tranſlated, and added it to the ſecond edition of his verſion. This ſecond edition is of Lyons 1626, printed by Anthony Chard. The copy I have ſeen, ſays in the title, that it was printed at Lyons in 1637, by Nicholas Gay. The work is in folio, and contains fourteen books; five for the Inſtitutiones Pharmaceuticæ, three for the Materia Medica, and ſix for the Antidotarium. There are a numberleſs multitude of typographical errors in them. Lewis de Serres was a native of Dauphiné, Fellow of the College of Phyſicians in Lyons, and has been omitted by Mr. Allard, in his Bibliotheque de Dauphiné. [Lewis de Serres lived forty years after this; and, in 1669, printed at Lyons, La veritable Medecine oppoſée à l'Errour, &c.]

[B] He ſometimes gives quarter to very childiſh traditions.] He gives but one inſtance of this. It is ſaid there is ſuch great virtue in the emerald, that it not only preſerves, from the falling ſickneſs, all thoſe who wear it on their fingers ſet in gold; but likwiſe ſtrengthens the memory, and powerfully reſiſts the effects of carnal concupiſcence. For it is related that a King of Hungary, being engaged in the amorous congreſs with his Queen, felt a beautiful emerald, which he wore on his finger, break into three pieces during their dalliance; ſo great a friend is this ſtone to chaſtity. This being ſo, methinks the interpreter of the Meſue was in the right to ſubſtitute the emerald inſtead of the turquoiſe &c (2).

(2) Renou, liv. 2. de la Matiere Medicinale, chap. 1. p. 406.

RESENIUS (PETER), Counſellor and Profeſſor in Copenhagen, was born there the 17th of June 1625. His father and his grandfathers, both by the father's and mother's ſide, were Biſhops of Sealand. He was appointed Sub-Principal of the College of Copenhagen in 1646; and having quitted that employment the following year, he ſet out to viſit foreign countries. He ſtudied, during four years, polite literature, and the law in the Univerſity of Leyden, after which he went into France, and then into Spain and Italy. He ſtay'd a whole year in Padua, where he applied himſelf chiefly to the ſtudy of the civil law. He was elected Counſellor of the German nation in that city; and Vice-Syndic of the Univerſity, in which quality he made a ſpeech in the Senate of Venice, and obtained a privilege for that Univerſity. It was in his power to have received the Order of Knighthood of St. Mark. He did not leave Padua till after having taken his Doctor's Degree in Law there, the 11th of September 1653. He returned to Denmark by the way of Germany, and married the 18th of July 1655. He was appointed Profeſſor of moral Philoſophy in the Univerſity of Copenhagen, the 25th of November 1657, afterwards Conſul of that city, Counſellor of the ſupreme Council; and laſtly, Preſident of Copenhagen, and Counſellor of Juſtice. He was ennobled the 18th of January 1680, and created Counſellor of State the 6th of May 1684. He formed a very fine library, which he left to the Univerſity of Copenhagen, and the catalogue of it was printed (a) in 1685. He alſo publiſhed ſeveral books (b) [A].

(a) At Copenhagen, in 4to.

(b) Extracted from the Journal of his Life, written by himſelf, and prefixed to the catalogue of his library.

[A] He alſo publiſhed ſeveral books.] Here follows a liſt of them: Edda Snorronis Sturleſonii triplici linguâ Iſlandicâ & Latinâ: quarum Iſlandica primitiva eſt, reliquæ autem interpretationes. Præfixa etiam prolegomena de triplici ratione docendi Ethicam: Item de Eddæ Scriptoribus, partibus & aliis ſimilibus. Impreſſum eſt hoc opus in quarta quam appellant forma, Anno M. DC. LXV. Eddæ Sæmundianæ pars dicta HAVAMAAL, complexa Ethicam Odini: eſque & Iſlandicè & Latinè impreſſa, in quarto, ut vocant, anno M. DC. LV. Eddæ Sæmundianæ VOLUSPA, continens Philoſophiam Danorum, Norvegorumque antiquiſſimam: eſque impreſſa in quarto, anno M. DC. LXV. item anno M. DC. LXXIII. additis Gudmundi Andreæ Iſlandi annotationibus. Inſcriptiones Havnienſes, Amagrienſes, & Uraniburgicæ, Latinæ, Danicæ, & Germanicæ; una cum addita narratione de Tychone Brahco diverſiſque ipſius et ſororis ipſius Sophiæ Brahcæ epiſtolis, editæ in quarto, anno M. DC. LXVIII. Jus aulicum vetus Regum Norvegorum, dictum HIRDSKRAA: Item Jus aulicum vetus Regum Danorum dictum VITHERLAGSRET, linguâ triplici, originali Iſlandica, interpretibus Danica, atque Latina, additæ quoque annotationes, Impreſſio facta Havniæ anno M. DC. LXXIII. Havniæ delineatio topographica in ære expreſſa, unà cum brevi partium & locorum enarratione, Danicè & Germanicè impreſſa Havniæ, anno M. DC. LXXIV. Samſoæ deſcriptio & delineatio cum figuris. In folio, Havniæ anno M. DC. LXXV. Friderici II. Hiſt. Danicè in folio cum figuris, Haf. anno M. DC. LXXV. Lexicon Iſlandicum Gudmundi Andreæ Iſlandi, cum præfatione de ejuſdem vita: in forma quarta Havnæ, anno M. DC. LXXXIII. Leges Cimbricæ Valdemari ſecundi Regis Donici, Germanicè, interprete Erico Krabbio, equite Danico. In præfatione addita eſt narratio de ordine equeſtri Dannebrogico: item de novo corpore Juris Danici: nec non de genealogia ejuſdem Erici Krabbii. Havniæ in quarto, anno M. DC. LXXXIV. Leges civiles & eccleſiaſticæ Chriſtiani Secundi in quarto, Havniæ anno M. DC. LXXXIV. Havniæ & Riparum jus urbicum. In 12. Havniæ, eodem anno M. DC. LXXXIV (1).

(1) Vita Reſenii, folio D ij verſo.

REVEREND-DE-BOUGY (JOHN), Marquis of Bougy, and Lieutenant General of the French armies in the reign of Lewis XIV. diſtinguiſhed himſelf on a numberleſs multitude of occaſions, by his great bravery and conduct, and by an inviolable adherence to the ſervice of his Sovereign, at a time when ſo many others went even to the rebels, during the time of the laſt civil war (a). He was a Proteſtant; of an ancient and noble family of Lower Normandy [A], and the younger of ſixteen brothers or ſiſters.

(a) Anno 1649 & ſeq.

[A] He was . . . of an ancient and noble family of lower Normandy.] He was ſon to MICHAEL REVEREND-DE-BOUGY, and grandſon of OLIVER REVEREND-DE-BOUGY, and great grandſon of MICHAEL REVEREND-

(b) A Memoir communicated to the Author.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Ibid.

(f) His Majeſty's patents for the creation of the Marquiſate of Bougy.

(g) Ibid.

(b) From the Memoir communicated.

ſifters (b). At twelve years of age he entered as a Cadet in the Regiment of Guards, and afterwards roſe from one poſt to another; he being ſucceſſively a Cornet, Captain of the Life-Horſe, Colonel, &c. (c). He was Cornet of the Gendarmes of Marſhal de Gaſſion (d), who had ſuch great friendſhip and eſteem for him [B], that this circumſtance alone proves his bravery, and other military accompliſhments. He was not of an ungrateful diſpoſition, he adhering ſo very zealouſly to the Marſhal, that Cardinal Mazarine could never win him over to his intereſt. His eminence was very urgent with him in that particular, when he went to the Court in order to make up for what the Marſhal's vivacity and boldneſs had ſpoiled (e). The Cardinal was more ſucceſsful, with regard to Mr. de Bougy, after Gaſſion's death [C]. His ſervices during the civil wars were great and important; and ſo advantageous an idea was entertained of his fidelity and conduct, that he was appointed chief Commander of the troops which were to continue with the King; which he did ſo ſucceſsfully, that after having beat the rebels, who would have prevented his paſſing the Loire at la Charité, and marching into Berri, he forced their Commander to abandon the city of Bourges; which, not long after, opened its gates to the King (f). Before this he had been chief Commander at the ſiege of Chateau Portien, which engaged his Majeſty, after he had taken that place, to beſtow the government of it upon him. . . . He ſignalized himſelf by taking Mas d'Agenois . . . at the retreat of St. Andras, and on many other occaſions, in one of which, being Lieutenant General, after having fought valiantly to the laſt extremity, he was taken priſoner (g) in 1653. He was permitted to go to Court upon his parole (b); and having been exchanged, he returned to Guienne, where in 1654 he married Mary de la Chauſade de Callonge, a very rich heireſs, by whom he left but one ſon [D]. The Queen-mother and Cardinal Mazarin concerned themſelves in the moſt obliging manner in that marriage [E]; and did not forget to mention the good ſervices of the Lady's father [F]. He ſerved in Catalonia the ſame year, under the Prince of

(1) From the Memoir communicated to me.

(2) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, Tom. 3. p. 776. edit. of 1685.

REVEREND-DE-BOUGY. The two laſt are mentioned in Mezerai's hiſtory, as will ſoon appear. We do not meet with any thing relating to their predeceſſors in printed books; but the records of the family go higher, though they are pretty imperfect; the houſe having been once plundered, and another time burnt, during the civil wars of the XVIth century (1). Mezerai mentions one Bougy (2) among the Lords who went to meet, in Caen, the Duke of Montpenſier, whom Henry III had ſent into Normandy, to prevent the Leaguers from corrupting that whole province. This Bougy was father of Oliver Reverend-de-Bougy, of whom Mezerai ſpeaks as follows: "Caen would have been loſt, had not "the reſolution and judgment of Oliver Reverend of "Bougy, a Gentleman of the country who happened to be there, checked the incurſion. But he "flew valiantly into the ſtreet, ſummoned his friends, "rouzed the inhabitants; but foreſeeing, in the "mean time, that the enemy would ſhut the gate "of the bridge, he diſpatched immediately one of "his men to nail a piece of wood to it. By this "means, when they attempted to ſhut it, the more "haſte they made, the leſs they perceived the obſtacle; when immediately he himſelf arrived, "with fifteen or twenty men who were animated by "his example. His arrival aſtoniſhed and confounded them; and as they could not ſhut the gate "cloſe, one of his followers, la Riviere-Renouf by "name, forcing himſelf into the gap with equal "boldneſs and courage, ſhot la Motte-Corbiniere "through the head with a piſtol, and by his death "defeated his deſign and that of his party. The "citizens were more ſenſible of the greatneſs of the "danger when it was over; and the King gave afterwards the following teſtimony of du Bougy; "that his fidelity, which he had already experienced "on other occaſions, had, on this, ſaved him all "lower Normandy (3)."

(3) Ibid. Vie de Henry IV. p. 1097, 1098.

(4) L'Abbé de Pure, Vie du Marechal de Gaſſion, Tom. 4. p. 309. ad ann. 1647.

(5) Extracted from the ſame Memoir.

(6) It is ſtill in the family.

[B] Marſhal de Gaſſion had ſuch great friendſhip and eſteem for him.] It is known that he died of the wound he had received in the ſiege at Lens, as he was endeavouring to move one of the ſtakes of a paliſado (4). He received a muſket ſhot in his head which ſtruck him down, and was immediately raiſed from the ground by his couſin de Gaſſion, and Marquis de Bougy, who only had followed him. Theſe carried him back into the trenches, after which he got himſelf convoyed to Arras, whither he was accompanied by Mr. de Bougy, at that time Marſhal of Battalia (5). The Marſhal, as he was dying, gave him his ſword (6). with this compliment, that he thought no man in all France ſo worthy of wearing it after him. The Marſhal's regiment was divided between Mr. de Gaſſion his couſin, and the Marquis de Bougy.

[C] The Cardinal was more ſucceſsful, with regard to Mr. de Bougy, after Gaſſion's death.] Having ſent for him to Court, the inſtant he had been informed of Marſhal de Gaſſion's death, he ſaid to him, I offer you a friend in the room of him you have loſt. The fidelity you always diſcovered for this Marſhal pleaſes me to ſuch a degree, that I intreat you to have the ſame for me, and offer you my friendſhip. Mr. de Bougy replied in ſuch a manner as was agreeable to the Cardinal; and was ſo true to his word, that when his eminence left France he attended him to the frontiers; when I come back, ſays the Cardinal to him, I will make your fortune; but when he was returned, he told him, that his being a Proteſtant was an obſtacle to it (7).

(7) Extracted from the Memoir in queſtion.

[D] He left but one ſon.] This was JOHN JAMES REVEREND-DE-BOUGY, born in 1655, and who, during nine years, commanded the regiment as Colonel, and left the ſervice only on account of his Religion, after which he retired to Holland. He now lives at the Hague, where he is greatly reſpected, as he juſtly deſerves. He has loſt his only ſon ſince he left France. There ſurvive only two daughters by his marriage, in 1674, with Elizabeth of Bar de Camparnau, deſcended, on the mother's ſide, from the famous Reniers, whoſe quarrel with Veiſius was attended with ſuch particular circumſtances, as are related by Thuanus (8) and Mezerai (9). This laſt hiſtorian relates, that he was Lieutenant of the Princes in Querci. The family of Bar de Camparnau is a very noble one; it is mentioned in many books, and particularly in the hiſtory of the ſiege of Montauban (10).

(8) Thuan. lib. 52. p. 1079. ad ann. 1572.

(9) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, Tom. 3. p. 259.

(10) From the above-cited Memoir.

[E] The Queen mother, and Cardinal Mazarin concerned themſelves in the moſt obliging manner, in that marriage.] The Marquis de Bougy was the bearer of a letter which that Queen wrote to Mademoiſelle de Callonge, in which her Majeſty deſired her to receive him as one coming from her. She added, As the ſervices of your late father oblige me to ſee you ſettled, I imagined I could not procure you a better huſband (11).

(11) Ibid.

[F] The good ſervices of the Lady's father.] This was James de la Chauſade, Baron de Callonge. He was Governor of Montpellier during the wars of Duke de Rohan, whoſe near relation he was. It was he who ſpoke in the name of the Proteſtants, when the peace was concluded before Montpellier. See du Pleix's hiſtory, and Girard's life of Duke d'Epernon, Baſſompierre's Memoirs, the life of Duke de Montmorenci, and ſeveral other authors. His Majeſty's letters patents, for the raiſing the Barony of of Conti, and the following years till 1657, when he was obliged to aſk leave to go to Montpellier, that he might be cured of a defluxion which was fallen upon his lungs. He got this diſtemper by paſſing a whole night upon the mountains, where, in his ſleep, he had been quite covered with ſnow. He could not find any eaſe in Montpellier, and meeting with no better ſucceſs in Bourdeaux, he went to his houſe at Callonge, and died there in 1658, aged forty, being univerſally regretted. The King, the Queen, and Cardinal Mazarin, did his widow the honour to ſend her letters of conſolation. He would have advanced higher in point of fortune, had he been a Roman Catholick. The Queen and the Cardinal had deſired him ſeveral times by letter, to change his religion, and to remove, by that means, the obſtacle to his advancement, and offered him a Marſhal's ſtaff, and any Government he might make choice of, provided he would turn Papiſt: but he anſwered, that if he could be prevailed upon to betray his God for a Marſhal of France's ſtaff, he might betray his King for a thing of much leſs conſequence; that he could not do either of them, but was contented to find that his ſervices were acceptable, and that the only obſtacle to his being rewarded was the religion he profeſſed (i). The King had made the Lordſhip of Bougy, in Lower Normandy, a Marquiſate; but as it is held of ſeveral Lords, ſuch a variety of oppoſitions were formed to the regiſtring of the patents, that they proved ineffectual. For this reaſon the erection was transferred to the Barony of Callonge, which holds immediately of the King. The patent was iſſued in November 1667, and regiſtred in the chamber of accounts the 9th of September 1669. I have read it, and found there an ample account of the ſervices, which Marquis de Bougy had done the King; they conſiſting not only of warlike exploits, but likewiſe of negotiations (k). Hereunder are related ſome of the moſt glorious circumſtances of his life [G]. He

(i) Extracted from the Memoir above.

(k) The words of the patent are as follow: Having, during all that time, as good an opinion of his prudence as of his valour, we employed him alſo in ſeveral important negotiations, and particularly with regard to the Duke of Modena, when he declared for us, and joined his army to ours in 1648.

of Callonge to a Marquiſate, declare, that this James de la Chauſade had been Colonel of a regiment of foot, in his Majeſty's ſervice, in Holland; that he had gained great reputation by his valour and experience in war, and by a great number of glorious actions atchieved by him, particularly during the commotions in Guienne under the government of Duke d'Epernon, during which, on two different occaſions, he led a conſiderable number of volunteers, among the gentry, to the King, a circumſtance that contributed not a little to ſupport his Majeſty's authority, and to curb the factious; that at the battle of Avein he took the enemies cannon, after he had broke through and routed them with his regiment of twenty companies; and, that his glory might not be bounded by the frontiers of this Kingdom, he followed Duke de Candale to Turkey, to wage war with the enemies of the Chriſtian name, where he blew up the gates of Agliman with a petard; and was one of the firſt who entered that place ſword in hand, after having ſignalized himſelf on ſeveral other occaſions (12). Mademoiſelle de Callonge, his other daughter, died at the Hague ſome months ago (13) in a very advanced age, unmarried. She was a lady of exemplary piety and virtue, and very well ſkilled in the Hebrew tongue (14). She left France, for the ſake of her Religion, when the edict of Nantz was repealed. Mezerai mentions, in his hiſtory, one Callonge, among the Proteſtant Lords of the province of Guienne, who took up arms againſt Charles IX (15).

(12) Extracted from the patent.

(13) I writ this in April 1701.

(14) See Colomeſius, p. 271 of Gallia Orientalis.

(15) Mezerai, Tom. 3. p. 93.

[G] Hereunder are related ſome of the moſt glorious circumſtances of his life.] He commanded, at the battle of Rocroi, the company of Gaſſion's Gendarmes; and though one of his feet was ſhattered with a muſket ball, he nevertheleſs broke through one of the enemies battalions, where his horſe was killed under him by thruſts of pikes or ſwords (16). Theſe are the expreſs terms of the patent cited above. In 1650 he threw himſelf into the town of St. Quentin with 500 horſe and by that means defeated the deſign the Spaniards had on this place which was in great danger. And after, when they beſieged the city of Guiſe, the counſel he gave, for poſting twelve hundred muſqueteers in the wood, to cut off the proviſions from the beſiegers, and the happy manner in which he himſelf conducted that enterprize, was one of the cauſes of raiſing the ſiege (17). The Court being determined to leave Paris in 1651, after the Prince of Conde had diſcovered his ill deſigns, the Queen ſent immediately for Mr. de Bougy in Flanders, and ſeeing him come into her chamber with his boots on, her Majeſty cried, Here is Bougy; I am not afraid now. Then directing herſelf to him, ſhe ſaid, that ſhe had ſent for him, to intruſt him with the King's perſon and her own, and accordingly, he conducted them to Fontainebleau. It is to be obſerved, that he was at that time only Marſhal de Camp, and that there were ſeveral officers at Court in higher poſts (18); but the Queen did not truſt to every one, or rather ſhe almoſt miſtruſted every one. Mr. de Bougy (19), at his leaving Flanders, had ordered a detachment of horſe to follow him, he himſelf having rid poſt thither. He was informed, as ſoon as he had brought the Court to Fontainebleau, that the Prince's forces were advancing towards Gien, in order to ſeize it. He then diſpatched a courier to the troops in Flanders, which had been commanded to follow him; and intreated them, for his ſake, to make all the diſpatch poſſible. The courier came up with them as they were marching into their quarters; and being ſhewn the orders, they did but juſt bait, and mounted their horſes again. Mr. de Bougy, the inſtant of their arrival, put himſelf at their head; and marching into Gien, he ordered the gate which ſtood towards the Prince's troops to be opened, when charging them with great briſkneſs, he defeated them, and took three general officers priſoners. As he was purſuing the routed enemy, he obſerved a young man who betrayed fear in his face; when aſking him his name, and being told that he was ſon to one of the chief Magiſtrates of Bourges; will you, ſays he to him, carry a letter to your father, whom her Majeſty looks upon as one of her moſt zealous ſervants? The young man promiſed to give the letter to his father; immediately after which Mr. de Bougy wrote to inform the Magiſtrate in queſtion, that he had juſt before defeated the Prince's troops, and was marching directly to Bourges. During this interval, the Prince of Conti had got into the town, and aſſembled the Magiſtrates, to oblige them to declare for him. Upon the arrival of the youth, the Prince of Conti laughed at the letter, and taking it for an artifice, went into another room, to draw up ſuch an anſwer, as he thought proper to be made to de Bougy's letter. Whilſt he was writing it, ſome wounded men arrived, who confirmed the truth of that news, upon which the Magiſtrates told him, that he might retire, for that they were determined to remain faithful to the King (20). The Prince then withdrew to Mouron, and from thence to Guienne (21). Mr. de Bougy was commanded to go with five hundred horſe, to croſs the river Né in Xaintonge, and over a very wide and very dangerous moraſs, behind which lay the forces of the rebels, conſiſting of four thouſand horſe and five thouſand foot; he diſlodged them from two of their beſt quarters, and brought back, priſoners, near five hundred troopers or officers. Being Lieutenant-General of the day, at the ſiege of Capdequiers in Catalonia, and the troops which attempted the ſtorm having been repulſed from the

(16) The patent.

(17) The patent.

(18) From the Memoir quoted above.

(19) Ibid.

(20) Ibid.

(21) The patent.

(l) Letters patents of the creation or erection.

He had received among other wounds, five muſket ſhots (l).

the breach, he ſeized a Serjeant's halbard, got firſt upon the breach, and brought back the ſoldiers by his example. He there was ſhot with a muſket-ball; and yet fought with great bravery till the town was taken, whereof he was made Governor, though it was no longer the cuſtom to reward Huguenot officers in that manner (22).

(22) From the patent.

REYNIER (PETER DE), Knight of the Order of St. John of Jeruſalem, was of the illuſtrious family of Reyniers of Toulouſe. He was killed anno 1311, in the iſland of Rhodes, to which Othoman King of the Turks laid ſiege that year. This Knight diſplayed the utmoſt bravery at that ſiege. This family has given birth to ſeveral perſons of the moſt diſtinguiſhed merit; and among the reſt, to ELIAS DE REYNIER, Counſellor in the Parliament of Languedoc in 1523, who was very remarkable for his great fidelity to his Prince; and whoſe ſon, who alſo was a Counſellor of Parliament, married Martha de Minut, daughter to Meſſire James de Minut, firſt Preſident in the above-mentioned Parliament: FRANCIS DE REYNIER, Seneſchal of Lauragois; JOHN DE REYNIER, Colonel of a Regiment. The ſurvivors of this family now are CHARLES DE REYNIER, Knight of the Order of St. Lewis, Lieutenant to his Majeſty, and Commander of the town and government of Brouage (a). He has a brother who is a Counſellor in the Parliament of Toulouſe (b).

(a) He died in Dec. 1705. See Mercure Galant, for Jan. 1706. p. 223, 224.

(b) Etat de la France.

REZ (ANTHONY DE), Eſq; Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, was ſon to ANTHONY DE REZ, Counſellor and Secretary to the King, and was born in Paris anno 1650. His merit will beſt appear, by inſerting two panegyricks which have been ſent me (a). I am perſuaded that all perſons of taſte will look upon them as well drawn up, and very worthy of ſerving as models. The firſt is more extenſive, and contains a greater number of particulars [A]. The ſecond is of great weight; it being extracted from a ſpeech ſpoke by an Attorney General, in the Parliament of Paris [B].

(a) By Mr. Marais, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris.

RHODOMAN

[A] The firſt elogium is more extenſive, and contains a greater number of particulars.] I ſhall tranſcribe it here in the very words I received it; it being my opinion, that the leaſt alteration in it, or ſuppreſſion would ſpoil it. " Anthony de Rez devoted himſelf, " from his youngeſt years, to the bar; and was but " ſixteen when he pleaded his firſt cauſe. After " continuing ſome time in the lower Courts to learn " their forms of proceeding, he appeared with diſ- " tinguiſhed luſtre, though but very young, in the " Parliament. The ſeveral talents by which he af- " terwards diſtinguiſhed himſelf were preſently diſ- " covered in him; an eaſy, lively and penetrating " genius; a noble, ſimple and natural eloquence; " a polite and happy delivery; a fund of Ciceronian " raillery; a certain inſinuation that was irreſiſtible; " a truth, which every feature in his face, and his " pleaſing countenance diſcovered before he ſpoke; " a probity that was proof to the moſt ſeducing " temptations; an agreeable and ſolid fund of eru- " dition reſulting from good ſenſe, juſtice and hu- " manity, rather than from books; in fine, all the " qualities that conſtitute the good and great man. " Immediately perſons of all ranks reſorted to him. " No man pleaſed perſons of diſtinction ſo well as " he did, becauſe of his good mein, his affability, " and his very genteel behaviour: and perſons of " low rank were deſirous of having him for their " defender, becauſe of his well known honour, his " kindneſs, and regard for every one. He diſcharged " his duty to both, by an exactneſs in the ſmalleſt " things, and the greateſt fidelity. Magiſtrates of " all ranks, firmly perſuaded that nothing but truth " could come from his lips, liſtened to him with com- " plaiſance, were delighted to ſee him, and honoured " him with the moſt ſingular affection. Though " quite crowded with buſineſs, his great regularity " and order enabled him to go through with it: " he was engaged in all cauſes of any importance: " he defended, with the utmoſt eloquence, that of the " Princes of Lorrain, with regard to the donation " of Madamoiſelle de Guiſe, and he afterwards de- " fended the validity of her laſt will. He was per- " petually engaged in conteſts, and always came off " victorious. If a client wanted an advocate, the " Court uſed to nominate him by a ſuperior order, " and entruſted him with ſuch cauſes as were given " over. Affairs of the greateſt conſequence increaſ- " ed and became eaſy in his hands. The moſt " knotty difficulties diſappeared the inſtant he un- " dertook them; and the Judges being put in a clear " and certain method by him, pronounced their " ſentences without any fear of being miſtaken. " Such he appeared at the bar; ſuch, and ſtill more " amiable if poſſible, he appeared in ſociety and " converſation. There never was a kinder, more " ſincere, and obliging friend; a better father, or " a better huſband. He led a life of purity, virtue " and innocence, which at the ſame time was " heightened by ſprightlineſs and gaiety. His ge- " nius ſuggeſted to him, at will, a thouſand inge- " nious amuſements, to unbend himſelf after his " great fatigues. None in his company ever grew " tired, nor was he ever tired with himſelf. He was " that univerſal man, whoſe picture Mr. Peliſſon has " drawn, in his preface to Sarrazin's works: an " excellent orator at the bar: a judicious chamber- " counſellor, a tender father and huſband in his family; " an uſeful and agreeable friend; in a word, adorned " with all the qualities, as well natural as acquired, " as can ſatisfy the mind of man. Nothing was " wanting but a longer life; he being ſnatched " away, in the middle of a moſt ſhining career, and " the moſt promiſing hopes, by a malignant fever, " the 7th of February 1694, at forty three years of " age, after ſeven days illneſs; leaving two children, " a ſon and a daughter, whom Magdelain du Four " his wife had brought him."

[B] The ſecond elogium is of great weight, it being extracted from a ſpeech, ſpoke by an Attorney-General, in the Parliament of Paris.] What follows is the continuation of the paſſage given in the remark above. " Mr. de Harlay then Attorney-General, " making a ſpeech at the opening of the Parliament " the ſame year, did not forget him, though he had " been dead ten months; and propoſed him as a " pattern to all his brethren in expreſſions that re- " flect the higheſt honour on his memory. They " are as follow: (*) To moderate the true liberty of " your profeſſion, we again repeat that it is not an eaſy " undertaking, nor of ſmall labour: it is the reſult of " a ſtudy, or rather a perpetual attention to our own " minds, and of an exact practice of ſeveral virtues. " It is thus one of your brethren, of whom an immature " death deprived us, not long ſince acquired the eſteem of " the public, and the friendſhip of all who were ac- " quainted with him; and had attained, in an age not " far advanced, the reputation and practice of the " greateſt (*) Diſcours prononce à la S. Martin 1694, ſur la Liberte.

RHODOMAN (LAURENCE) was born anno 1546, in the village of Saſſowerf (a), belonging to the Counts of Stolberg in Upper Saxony. The happy genius for learning, which he had diſcovered from his moſt tender years, induced thoſe Counts to maintain him in the College of Ilfeld (b). He continued there ſix years; and made ſo great a progreſs under Michael Neander (c), that he afterwards was qualified to be principal teacher in the moſt eminent publick ſchools, and moſt flouriſhing Univerſities [A]. He was eſpecially well ſkilled in the Greek tongue. He compoſed ſome Greek verſes, which have been admired by the beſt Judges (d), but Scaliger did not like his Latin poetry [B]. He was very ſucceſsful in his Latin tranſlation of Diodorus Siculus. He at laſt was appointed Hiſtory Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Wittemberg, and died there the 8th of January 1606. I ſhall give a catalogue of his principal works [C]. He had had the honour to be made Poet Laureate. NICHOLAS RHODOMAN his ſon has publiſhed ſomething (e).

(a) Rhodomanus, Epiſt. Dedicat. Quinti Smyrnæi. Quenſtedt, de Patriis Illuſtr. p. 219.

(b) Their anceſtors had founded it in the monaſtery of that name, by the advice of Luther and Melanchthon. See Rhodoman's Dedication to Quintus Calaber.

(c) See the ſame dedication, and the preface to his verſion of Diodorus Siculus.

(d) See the rem. [B].

(e) Konig, Bibl. p. 689.

" greateſt advocates. Adorned with thoſe exteriour " graces, which nature alone can beſtow, he diſplayed in " his countenance, the characteriſticks of probity and " modeſty which were conſpicuous in his whole conduct. " You have ſeen him, at his firſt ſetting out, ſuſtain glo- " rioufly the weight of the greateſt actions, and defend " the moſt difficult cauſes, with equal politeneſs and ſo- " lidity. Attentive to all his duties, zealous for his " clients, courteous to his brethren, reſpectful to the Ma- " giſtrates, he has given the moſt ſhining proofs, that " if ſometimes the neceſſity of your employment, or the ex- " preſs orders of your ſuperiours, oblige you to ſpeak " in favour of impoſture or calumny, you may undertake the defenſe of guilt without ſtaining your " honour, and conſcience; and even ſay the moſt " ungrateful things, without breaking the ſtricteſt " rules of decorum and civility. But it is not enough " to pay interiorly this ſad duty to his memory; nor take " a pleaſure in hearing the elogiums he has ſo juſtly de- " ſerved. His example ſhould excite you to imitate his " virtues; and continue to force us, by your regular con- " duct, to ſpend theſe ſolemn days in publiſhing your praiſ- " es; without being put under a neceſſity of cenſuring " ſuch faults as are contrary to the duties of your pro- " feſſion, and which we are proud to ſee are ſo rarely " found among you."

[A] He afterwards was qualified to be principal Teacher in the moſt eminent publick ſchools, and moſt flouriſhing Univerſities.] Here follows what he himſelf tells us (1): Eoſque in his, σὺν Θεῷ καὶ μούσαις, progreſſus feci, ut nobilium inde puerorum, & illuſtriſſ. principum informationi neque immature neque infructuoſe applicarer; Scholarum etiam bene conſtitutarum adminiſtrationi dehinc præficerer. i. e. " By the aſſiſtance of God " and the Muſes, I made ſuch advances in theſe ſtu- " dies, that I was employed, from that time, both " ſeaſonably and propitiouſly, to inſtruct the children " of the Nobility, and the moſt illuſtrious Princes. I " afterwards was appointed to preſide over ſome well " regulated ſchools." The places where he taught, are thus mentioned in his funeral programma: Docuit Walcerodi, docuit Jenæ, docuit Straleſundi, docuit denique Wittebergæ, atque ita docuit ut eruditione, ſedulitate, ac dexteritate ſecundus haberi nemini debeat (2). We are here told, that he diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo well by his learning, aſſiduity and ſkill in teaching, in the abovementioned cities, that he was excelled by none. He was Greek Profeſſor ſeven years in Jena, and four years Hiſtory-Profeſſor in Wittemberg (3).

(1) In Epiſtola dedicatoria Quinti Calabri.

(2) Daniel Sennertus, in Programmate, apud Henningum Witte, Memor. Philoſoph. p. 24.

(3) Ibid. p. 25.

[B] Scaliger did not like his Latin poetry.] Here follows what he ſaid in converſation: Rhodomanus doctiſſimus in Poeſi Græca, ſed in Latina imperitus & infelix. . . Bonum Diodorum Siculum edidit; i. e. " Rho- " domanus is extremely well ſkilled in Greek poetry, " but ignorant and unhappy in that of the Latin . . . " He publiſhed a fine Diodorus Siculus." . . . . . A pretty man, qui latuit, like Leopardus, who was a ſkillful Grecian. I wrote ſo many letters, into Germany, about Rhodomanus, that they were ſhewn to the Duke of Saxony, who called him, from a trifling ſchool in Pomerania, to Wittemberg. He is very ugly and clowniſh. . . He is a Poet and a good Grecian. . . . . He drew up a chronology, in which he reſolved to contradict every body, and me alſo. There are the moſt trifling things in the world in his book. Chronologers have committed a great number of errors. Rhodoman doats in his old age; he pronounces like Vulcanius. Rhodomanus carmina Latina non benè ſcribit, ſed Græca bona; bonus eſt Græcus in Poetis (4).

(4) Scaligerana, Voce Rhodomanus, p. m. 204.

I am to obſerve, that Scaliger confounded our Laurence Rhodoman with one Laurence Codoman (5), Author of four books of chronology, which he annexed to his annals of the holy ſcriptures, publiſhed at Wirtemberg in 1581. The moſt learned men often commit ſuch faults in converſation; which they may eaſily do, when there is but about the difference of a letter in the names of Authors. This is what Scaliger did.

(5) See Mollerus, p. 716 of his Homonymoſcopia.

[C] I ſhall give a catalogue of his principal works.] He made a Latin tranſlation of the Greek poem of Cointus Smyrnæus, or Quintus Calaber, concerning the taking of Troy, and added ſome corrections to it. I am of opinion, that the commentaries he wrote on that Author were never printed; and it is at random that Moreri and others affirm, that they are greatly eſteemed. I make uſe of an edition of that work (6), in which there are two Greek and Latin poems of Rhodoman: the one entitled ΙΛΙΑΣ ΜΙΚΡΑ, containing an abridgment of the Iliad, and of Quintus Calaber; and the other entitled ΤΡΟΙΚΑ, contains an epitome of the Trojan war, ex variis auctoribus decerpta. There likewiſe is inſerted the ſpeech, in which Dion Chryſoſtom aſſerts that Troy was not taken, with a Latin verſion by Rhodoman, and ſome Scholia. Here follow the titles of ſome other works (7). Hiſtoria vitæ & doctrinæ Martini Lutheri carmine heroico deſcripta. (8) Deſcriptio Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiæ, ſive populi Dei Politiæ ejuſdem & rerum præcipuarum, quæ in illo populo acciderunt, Græco carmine, cum verſione Latina è regione textus Græci, Francof. 1581, in 8vo. Poeſis Chriſtiana, id eſt, Paleſtinæ ſeu Hiſtoriæ ſacræ Græco-Latinæ libri 9. Marpurgi 1589. Francof. 1590, 1630, in 4to. Argonautica, Thebaica, Ilias parva. Lipſ. 1588, in 8vo. Tabulæ Etymologiæ Græcæ. ibid. 1590, 8vo. Memnonis Hiſtoria de Republica Heraclienſium, & rebus Ponticis Eclogæ: ſeu excerptæ & abbreviatæ narrationes in Sermonem Latinum tranſlatæ. Helmſtadii 1591, in 4to. Epithalamia ſacra. Jenæ 1594, in 4to. Ex Memnone, de Tyrannis Heracleæ Ponticæ Cteſia & Agatharchide excerptæ Hiſtoriæ Græcè & Latinè partim ex Laur. Rhodomani interpretatione. Geneva 1593, 8vo. Theologiæ Chriſtianæ tyrocinia, carmine Heroico Græco-Latino in 5 libros digeſta. Lipſ. 1597, 8vo. His Germanis was not printed at his death, and it is greatly applauded in his funeral programma. Imprimis opus illud auro contra æſtimandum, quod de origine, moribus ac rebus geſtis veterum Germanorum Græcè ſcripſit, & Germanidem inſcripſit. Quod opus unicum tale eſt, ut animum atque ingenium hominis excellentem, charitateque patriæ inſigniter flagrantem, abundè oſtendat (9). Witte (10) ranks it in the catalogue of the printed works of Rhodoman, but does not mention the year in which it was publiſhed at Wittemberg.

(6) That of 1614.

(7) Witte, Mem. Philoſoph. p. 28.

(8) Idem, ibid. p. 27.

(9) Sennertus, in Programmate, apud Witte, p. 24.

(10) Ubi ſupra.

RHODOPE, a famous Courtezan, contemporary with Æſop, and a ſlave in the ſame houſe with him, was born in Thrace (a). Xanthus the Samian took her into Ægypt, where Charaxus a Merchant of Mitylene (b), and brother of Sappho, was ſo ſmit with her, that he purchaſed her for a very conſiderable ſum of money. By this means ſhe obtained her liberty; and being a woman of great beauty, and as the city of Naucratis

(a) Herodot. lib. 2. cap. 134.

(b) A city of the iſland of Lesbos.

cratis where ſhe fixed her abode abounded with wealthy perſons, of a ſenſual turn of mind, ſhe amaſſed great riches by turning courtezan (c). However, we muſt not ſuppoſe that ſhe got ſo much money by that profeſſion, as enabled her to build one of thoſe pyramids [A], which have been ranked among the ſeven wonders of the world. Herodotus rejects this as fabulous; and the ſame muſt be ſuppoſed of what we are told concerning her ſhoe [B]. Athæneus is of opinion, that Dorica the Courtezan, miſtreſs to Sappho's brother, was confounded by Herodotus with Rhodope (d).

(c) Extracted from Herodot. lib. 2. cap. 135.

(d) Athen. lib. 13. p. 596.

[A] Enabled her to build one of thoſe pyramids.] Pliny does not ſpeak of this in a doubtful manner; but perhaps he did not believe any thing of it; and that the only reaſon of his writing in that manner was, to have an opportunity of ſhewing his wit. He obſerves, that the dimenſions and magnificent ſtructure of the pyramids is not the moſt ſurprizing circumſtance in this wonder of the world; the greateſt miracle, continues he, is, that a Courtezan ſhould have amaſſed ſuch treaſures, as to be able to defray the expences of that pyramid, which is moſt admired. Hæc ſunt pyramidum miracula: ſupremumque illud, ne quis regum opus, miretur minimam ex his, ſed laudatiſſimam, à Rhodope meretricula factam. Æſopi fabularum Philoſophi conſerva quondam & contubernalis hæc fuit, majore miraculo tantas opes meretricio eſſe conquiſitas quæſtu (1). This tradition was one of the romantick tales invented by the Grecians. Herodotus, who was credulous enough of ſtories, does nevertheleſs refute this. He aſſerts (2), that the pyramid which Rhodope was ſaid to have built, was built ſeveral years before the reign of Amaſis, under whom that Courtezan lived. He adds (3), that though ſhe had acquired great riches, it yet would not have been poſſible for her to defray the immenſe ſums, which that building would have coſt. He proves it by a very ſtrong reaſon. We know very well, ſays he, the amount of this woman's riches; for the iron ſpits which ſhe conſecrated at Delphi, and which coſt her the tenth part of her ſubſtance, are ſtill in that temple. Theſe ſpits were to roaſt oxen. The Prieſts under the heathen ſyſtem were not over nice; they thinking the ſmell that iſſued from profit or gain very ſweet, though the thing from which it aroſe was ever ſo ſtinking; and it is from them that Veſpaſian might have learned this maxim of Juvenal.

(1) Plin. lib. 36. cap. 12. p. m. 302.

(2) Herodot. lib. 2. cap. 134.

(3) Idem, ibid. cap. 135.

Lucri bonus eſt odor ex re
Qualibet (4).

(4) Juven. ſatyr. 14. ver. 204. See Suetonius, in Veſpaſiano, cap. 23.

" He that grows rich by ſcow'ring of a ſink,
" Gets wherewithal to juſtify the ſtink.
J. DRYDEN, Jun.

They uſed to receive with joy the offerings made by Courtezans, and conſecrated them amid the moſt celebrated monuments of the devotion of people; this was immortalizing the guilt of thoſe Courtezans in the manner they deſired. The only motive, which prompted Rhodope to devote the tenth part of her plunder to the making of ſpits, was, to raiſe an eternal monument to herſelf in Greece. Ἐπεθύμησε γὰρ Ῥοδῶπις μνημεῖον αὐτῆς ἐν τῇ Ἑλλάδι καταλοπίσθαι, ποίημα ποιησαμένη τοῦτο. τὸ μὲν τυγχάνει ἄλλῳ ἐξευρημένον, καὶ ἀνακείμενον ἐν ἱρῇ, τοῦτο ἀναθεῖναι ἐς Δελφοὺς μνημόσυνον ἑωυτῆς. τῆς ὧν δικάτης τῶν χρημάτων ποιησαμένη ὀβελοὺς βοῶν ὁσίρῖνς, ὅσον ἐνεχώρει ἡ δικάτη οἱ, ἀπέπεμπε ἐς Δελφούς. οἱ καὶ νῦν ἔτι συνεσταται, ὀπισθεμὲν τοῦ βωμοῦ τὸν Χῖοι ἀνέθεσαν, ἀντίον δὲ αὐτοῦ τοῦ νηοῦ (5). i. e. " Rhodope being deſirous of tranſmitting her name to " poſterity among the Greeks, cauſed things to be " made, which no one had ever thought of before, or " made a gift of; and preſented them to the Temple " of Delphos, as a monument left by her. She " cauſed as many iron ſpits for roaſting of oxen to " be made, as the tenth part of her ſubſtance could " buy, and ſent the ſpits to Delphos. They are " ſtill depoſited behind the altar raiſed by the Chians, " and oppoſite to the Temple itſelf." The Jewiſh laws did not allow any ſuch unhallowed thing (6).

(5) Herodot. lib. 2. cap. 135.

(6) Non inferes mercedem meretricis, aut pretium canis in domum Dei tui in quocunque voto, quia abominatio eſt utrumque apud Dominum Deum tuum. Deuteron. xxiii. 18.

[B] What we are told concerning her ſhoe.] One day as ſhe was bathing, and her maids were looking after her clothes, an eagle came down, ſeized one of her ſhoes, carried it to Memphis, and dropped it in the lap of King Pſammitichus, who was then ſitting on his tribunal, adminiſtring juſtice. He admired the beauty of the ſhoe, and the eagle's action; and commanded an enquiry to be made throughout all Egypt, for the Lady, who had been plundered of her ſhoe in this manner. Accordingly ſhe was found; and being brought to him, he made her his Queen (7). As to myſelf, I do not believe a word of this, though fortune ſometimes takes a pleaſure in ſuch pranks. ἡ τὰ παράδοξα καὶ τὰ ἀδόκητα φιλέοντα ἐργάζεσθαι τύχη, inopinatorum atque inexpectatorum amans fortuna (8). Rhodope, who was a captive along with Æſop, would willingly have married this monſtrous man. What a change would this have wrought! She would have been wife to an auguſt Monarch, and ranked among thoſe perſons,

(7) Extracted from Ælian, Var. Hiſt. lib. 13. cap. 33. See alſo Strabo, lib. 17. p. 556.

(8) Ælian. ibid.

Quales ex humili magna ad faſtigia rerum
Extollit, quoties voluit fortuna jocari (9).

(9) Juven. ſatyr. 3. ver. 39.

" Whom for her pleaſure, fortune can advance;
" And toſs them topmoſt on the wheel of chance.
Dryden, a little altered.

We may obſerve by the way, that wit and good ſenſe may get the better in a girl's mind, of the effects of deformity. Æſop, though the ugliеſt of mortals, made an impreſſion on Rhodope's heart (10).

(10) Herodot. lib. 2. cap. 34.

RICCI (MICHAEL ANGELO) raiſed to the purple by Pope Innocent XI. the 1ſt of September 1681, was born at Rome in 1619. He was fond of the mathematicks, and made great progreſs in them, as appears from his treatiſe de maximis & minimis, which has borne two or three impreſſions. He wrote two diſſertations, one of which is inſerted in Cardinal Brancaccio's works; and the other in Carlo Dati's Epiſtle ad Philalethos. He afterwards applied himſelf with prodigious aſſiduity to the ſtudy of Divinity. He has been applauded by very famous Authors, ſuch as Gaſſendi, Renatus Francis Sluſius, Cardinal Pallavicini, Fabretti, &c. He collected a very fine library (a). He had been raiſed to ſeveral employments before he was created Cardinal; and among others, to that of ſecretary of the congregation of indulgences and of relicks, and that of conſultor of the holy office. He was in thoſe employments in 1678, when he gave his approbation to the Biſhop of Condom's book, entitled, l'Expoſition de la Doctrine Catholique.

(a) Extracted from Proſper Mandoſius, Bibl. Rom. Cent. 5. p. 344, 345.

RICHER, or RICHIER (PETER), a Carmelite and Doctor of Paris (a), turned Proteſtant, and withdrew to Geneva, where he was admitted into the miniſtry anno 1556, to be ſent into America, to the Sieur de la Villegagnon (a). He was then above fifty (c). He embarked at Honfleur the 19th of November of the ſame year, with Mr. Chartier, a Miniſter alſo, and with ſome perſons whom the Church of Geneva thought proper for Villegagnon's deſign (d). He arrived at the iſland of Colligni the 10th of March

(a) Thevet, Coſmogr. Univerſelle, liv. 21. ch. 2. folio 909.

(b) Jean de Leri, Hiſt. d'un Voiage de l'Amerique, chap. 1. p. m. 6.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Ibid. chap. 2. p. 8.

March 1557 (e), where he preached that very day in Villegagnon's Preſence, who was perpetually lifting up his hands, turning his eyes to Heaven, venting deep ſighs, and ſuch like (f), which filled the whole company with admiration. They adminiſtred the ſacrament a few days after, and John Cointa, formerly a Doctor of Sorbonne, abjured the Romiſh errors (g). Villegagnon made admirable prayers, and received on his knees, the bread and wine from the Miniſter's hand (h). The hopes that were grounded on theſe outward teſtimonies of zeal ceaſed very ſoon; he and Cointa diſputing ſoon after about the Anti-chriſt, with Richier and Chartier (i). The laſt mentioned was ſent to Geneva to carry the ſtate of the diſpute to Calvin; Villegagnon declaring that he would ſubmit to his deciſion (k). However, he pulled off the maſk before Calvin's anſwer was come (l). He declared himſelf a Papiſt a little after the Communion of Whitſuntide (m): and had he been powerful enough, he would have dealt roughly with Peter Richier, and the reſt of the Genevois (n). However, he only commanded them to depart, and they obeyed his orders. I have ſpoke more largely of this matter elſewhere (o). They imbarked the 5th of January 1558 (p); and after having ſuffered prodigiouſly (q), they arrived at the port of Blavet in Britany the 26th of May following (r). Richier was afterwards Miniſter of the Church of Rochelle [A], and publiſhed a piece againſt the Sieur de Villegagnon [B]. Nothing can be more ridiculous than to make him chief of the ſect of the Richerians; and to affirm that this pretended faction was tainted with the Neſtorian hereſy; and nevertheleſs a celebrated Jeſuit has preſumed to do this [C]. He adds that

(e) Jean de Leri, Hiſt. d'un Voiage de l'Amerique, chap. 6. p. 55.

(f) Ibid. p. 56.

(g) Ibid. p. 59.

(h) Ibid. p. 66.

(i) Ibid. p. 67.

(k) Ibid. p. 68.

(l) Ibid. p. 76. See alſo Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. liv. 2. p. 160.

(m) Leri, ch. 6. p. 76. See alſo Theod. de Beze, ubi ſupra.

(n) Leri, ibid. p. 83.

(o) In the art. VILLEGAGNON.

(p) Leri, chap. 21. p. 341.

(q) John de Leri, one of them has deſcribed them, ibid. chap. 21 and 22.

(r) Ibid. p. 373.

[A] Richier was afterwards Miniſter of the Church of Rochelle.] "At this time Peter Richier returning "from America, where he had greatly ſuffered under the tyranny of Villegagnon, a very wicked "and moſt villainous apoſtate, came to Rochelle, "where he found about fifty perſons, who had been "gathered together in the Lord, by the miniſtry of "la Fontaine and la Place, whom he ſpoke of in "the hiſtory of the preceding year. He ſtrengthened this little flock ſo greatly in a ſhort time, that "a conſiſtory, and the reſt of the eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, was eſtabliſhed there. And this firſt beginning was ſo much favoured by the Lord, that a "conſiderable part of the citizens came over in a "ſhort time to the Church of the Lord, quitting the errors of the Romiſh church. The "Lord preparing for himſelf this place at that time, "in order that it might one day oppoſe the ſtrongeſt "efforts of its adverſaries (1)." He was living when John de Leri printed his relations, I mean in 1577; he ſpeaking as follows of the ſufferings they met with during their voyage, "As to Mr. Peter Richier, "now Miniſter of the church of Rochelle; this worthy man will tell you, that being ſtretched along, "through weakneſs, in his little cabin, he was not "able to lift up his head, to offer up his prayers to "God, whom nevertheleſs, in the poſture he lay in, "he called upon with great fervour (2)." I muſt obſerve, that Moreri is miſtaken, when he ſays that Richier, after his return from America, was Miniſter of Geneva. I alſo muſt obſerve, that Mr. Vincent (3), who quotes Beza's words, and adds that they gave occaſion to Poupeliniere * call Richier the father of the church of Rochelle, obſerves that what Beza ſays concerning the eſtabliſhment of the conſiſtory in that year 1558, is proved by the regiſters of records of the church; but ſo far was he from ſaying that Richier was appointed Miniſter of that place, he declares (4) that the Paſtor eſtabliſhed at the firſt creation of the conſiſtory, was named Fayet. I own he ſays that in 1561, this church had two Paſtors, who were the Sieurs Fayet and de l'Iſle, the laſt of whom was our Richier (5).

(1) Theod. de Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſtiq. liv. 2. p. 139, 140. ad ann. 1558.

(2) Leri, Hiſt. du Voiage de l'Amerique, chap. 22. p. m. 368.

(3) Vincent, Recherches ſur les commencemens & les premiers progres de la Reformation de la Ville Rochelle, p. 27, 28.

* Poupel. l. 5. au commencement.

(4) Vincent, &c. p. 44.

(5) Pierre Richer, Sieur de l'Iſle, ibid. p. 27.

[B] He publiſhed a piece againſt the Sieur de Villagagnon.] The book entitled, A refutation of the idle dreams and falſhoods of Nicholas Durand, called Chevalier de Villegagnon, printed in 1562, in 8vo, was not written by James Spifame, under Peter Richier's name, as is affirmed by du Verdier Vau-Privas (6), it being writ by the perſon whoſe name is prefixed to it. We find the following title in Geſner's Bibliotheque: Petri Richerii Apologetici libri duo, contra Nicolaum Durandum qui ſe Vilagagnonem vocat, quibus illius in pios Americanos tyrannidem exponit, & negotium Sacramentarium tractat. Genevæ 1561, in 4to (7). Add to this the following words of John de Leri: "But becauſe "when Villegagnon was returned to France, not only "Peter Richer painted him in his genuine colours; "but others have ſince curried and bruſhed him * "ſo handſomly, that he did not dare to open his "mouth; I ſhall ſay no more of this for fear of "tiring my Readers (8)." A glaring inſtance that Moreri did not well examine the things he advanced, is, that after having ſaid a great many handſom things of Villegagnon, he refers us to his life (9), written by Richier; a work in which Villegagnon muſt neceſſarily appear in the blackeſt colours.

(6) Du Verdier, Bibl. Franc. p. 620.

(7) Epitom. Bibl. Geſn. p. m. 682.

* L'Eſtrille, (Curry-comb) and l'Eſpouſſette (Bruſh), are two little pieces printed againſt Villegagnon.

(8) Leri, Hiſt. du Voiage de l'Amerique, chap. 6. p. 74.

(9) Moreri, under the word Villegagnon.

[C] A celebrated Jeſuit has preſumed to do this.] If the Reader looks into Father Gaultier's chronological tables, he will find that the 63d chapter of the 16th century, is entitled, DE RICHERIANIS, DUCE Petro Richerio, (concerning the RICHERIANS, Peter Richer being their chief). He affirms (10) that this Peter Richer taught in America, in Villegagnon's preſence, that Chriſt, as man, ought not to be worſhiped. This is one of the proofs which this Jeſuit alledges, where he aſſerts that the Calviniſts revived the impious tenets of Neſtorius. Calvini veſtigiis, ſays he (11), inſiſtit Petrus Richerius in Americam ab eo miſſus anno 1557. quùm & præſente Domino Villagagnono prædicat, & coram Notario publico Franciſco Alberico mordicus tuetur, Jeſum Chriſtum in carne humana non eſſe adorandum. Tuetur, inquam, dum reſpondet ad interpellationem ſibi per eum factam ejuſdem D. Villagagnoni nomine, utpote cauſam exigentis cur Jeſum Chriſtum adorare nolit. Horum nobis omnium fidem facit tum Epiſtola ejuſdem Villagagnoni ad Eccleſiam Chriſtianam data, tum ea quam octavo Julii anno 1560 ad Magiſtratum Genevenſem ſcripſit, tum annexa ejuſdem Notarii teſtificatio, quam diei decimæ quartæ Maii anni 1559. nota obſignavit; tum altera teſtificatio die octavo Junii 1558. data ſubſcriptaque à D. Petro à Falcilla, quem D. Villagagnonus ad Miniſtrum Richerium 27 Decembris 1557 miſerat, rationem ejuſmodi doctrinæ ſciſcitaturum: ubi aſſerit ſe, dum à Miniſtro Richerio quæreret, cur inter orandum non dicerit, Gloria Patri & Filio & Spiritui Sancto, &c. reſponſum planè nullum accepiſſe: dum autem denuntiaret, conqueri D. Villagagnonum, quod nullam unquam ad Jeſum Chriſtum precationem dirigeret, hoc ſe à Miniſtro reſponſum habuiſſe, hæreticum illum arbitrandum eſſe, qui neceſſe duxerit orare Jeſum Chriſtum *. Num hac loquendi formula uti potuiſſet Miniſter Richerius, ſi credidiſſet in carne humana Jeſu Chriſti aliam non eſſe hypoſtaſim, ſubſiſtentiam aut perſonam, niſi Verbi Divini? i. e. "Peter Richer treads in the ſteps of Calvin, "who ſent him into America in 1557; ſince he "preaches up in preſence of Villegagnon, and obſtinately maintains before Francis Albericus a public notary, that Jeſus Chriſt muſt not be worſhipped, as man. He aſſerted, I ſay, this doctrine very "obſtinately, in the anſwer made him in the name "of the ſaid Villagagnon, who put the queſtion to "him, why he refuſed to worſhip Jeſus Chriſt. The "truth of all this is evident, from the ſaid Villagagnon's letter directed to the Church of Chriſt; from "his letter, dated the eighth of July 1560, and directed to the Magiſtrates of Geneva; as alſo from "the certificate of the ſaid notary annexed to it, "ſigned

(10) Gaulterius, Tab. Chron. p. m. 802.

(11) Ibid. p. 376. col. 2. See alſo Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calviniſme, liv. 2. p. 103. Dutch edit.

* Extant hæc omnia inter controverſias Villagagnoni.

(s) Rem [A] of the art. LERI.

that Richier infected, with his errors, the inhabitants of Annonai in Vivarez [D]. I ſpoke elſewhere (s) of a letter which this Miniſter wrote from America.

" ſigned May the 14th 1559; and from another certi" ficate dated the 8th of June 1558, and ſigned by " Peter Falcilla, whom Villegagnon had ſent to " Richer the Miniſter the 27th of December 1557,
" to enquire the grounds and reaſons why he main" tained that Doctrine. He aſſerts in the writing in " queſtion, that when he aſked Richer, why he did " not ſay, in his prayers, Glory be to the Father, and " to the Son, and to the Holy Ghoſt, &c. he made no
" anſwer: but upon his being told, that Villegag-
" non was offended, becauſe he did not addreſs any " prayer to Chriſt, he replied as follows, that that " man ought to be conſidered as a heretick, who " thought it abſolutely neceſſary for Chriſt to be ad-
" dreſſed in prayer. Now could Richer the Miniſter
" have ſpoke in this manner, had he believed that " there is no other hypoſtaſies, ſubſiſtence or perſon,
" in Chriſt's human nature, but that of the Word?"
The reader may apply to the pretended ſect of the Richerians, what I ſaid in the Article BEZANITES. Spondanus affirms that, among the followers of Richer, ſome were ſo impious as to deny the reſurrection (12). But when I call to mind, that Vincent, in the above cited work, makes ſcarce any mention of Peter Richier, I cannot forbear laughing at the boldneſs of thoſe writers, who declare that a perſon, who made ſo little a figure, was the head of a ſect. By the way, many Divines among the Calviniſts are of opinion that Chriſt's humanity, in abſtracto, ought not to be worſhipped (13). If Peter Richier aſſerted only this, he was in no danger of paſſing for a heretick among thoſe of his community.

(12) Spondan. ad ann. 1555. num. 15.

(13) See Saurin's Examen de la Theologie de Mr. Jurieu, p. 738 & ſeq.

I am to obſerve that Varillas went farther than Spondanus; he affirming that Richier taught, that the life to come is promiſed only to the ſouls of Chriſtians; that they would be happy only with regard to the ſoul; and therefore, that as the Lord's Supper was not inſtituted to ſupply their wants; it ought to be but rarely frequented (14). I am of opinion that he taught only this; that as the Sacrament of the Euchariſt was not inſtituted for the ſupport of the body, it was not neceſſary that Chriſt's fleſh ſhould be contained in it. All the reſt was a ſuperſtructure which his enemies raiſed on this foundation.

(14) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, liv. 21. p. 18, 19.

[D] He adds that Richier infected with his errors, the inhabitants of Annonai in Vivarez.] He does not inform us when this was; but doubtleſs it was before he went to America. Probè novi hunc Petrum Richerium fuiſſe illum ipſum, qui urbi Annonæenſi in Vivarienſi provincia malorum plurimorum author fuit. Cum enim in eam, ſe Catholicum ſimulans, eſſet ingreſſus, imò & menſes aliquot in concionibus ea ſimulatione uſus, tandem ubi ſe in præcipuorum civium, qui illum ſæpe convivio exceperant, amicitiam inſinuatum vidit, cordis ſui peſtem aperuit; primùm quidem privatim, deinde verò è pulpito pleno ore in Sacramenta invectus, ac nominatim in Realitatem Euchariſticam. Quod ubi animadvertunt Magiſtratus, dum in eum inquirunt, ecce evaneſcit homo nequam, majorem tamen urbis partem erroribus illaqueatam relinquens (15). i. e. " I very well know, that " this Peter Richer is the individual perſon, who oc-
" caſioned many evils in the town of Annonai in " Vivarez. For being gone thither upon the pre-
" tence of being a Roman-Catholick, and having " preached in the pulpits for ſome months under that
" diſguiſe; finding, at laſt, that he had ingratiated
" himſelf into the friendſhip of ſome of the chief
" inhabitants, at whoſe houſes he had often been " entertained, he diſcovered the malignity of his " heart; he inveighing, firſt of all privately, and
" then loudly in the pulpit, againſt the bleſſed Sa" crament. As ſoon as the Magiſtrates ſaw this,
" they began to make an enquiry into the affair;
" when immediately the worthleſs wretch ſtole away;
" but had firſt infected the moſt part of the towns-
" people with his errors." It was proper for me to relate this incident, as belonging to the hiſtory of our Richier.

(15) Gaulterius, Tab. Chron. p. 802. col. 1.

RICIUS (PAUL), a converted Jew, was a German, and flouriſhed in the 16th Century. He was Profeſſor of Philoſophy in Pavia, by which means he acquired great reputation, and won the eſteem of many learned men, who recommended him ſo advantageouſly to the Emperor Maximilian, that this Monarch prevailed with him to come into Germany, and made him one of his phyſicians. He publiſhed ſeveral books againſt the Jews, and on ſome other ſubjects [A]. He is greatly applauded for his candour, civility, moderation, and learning (a). See his elogium in a letter of Eraſmus [B], that will be cited hereunder. The famous John Eckius was among the number of his adverſaries;

(a) Extracted from Melch. Adamus, in Vitis Medicorum, p. 9, 10.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral books againſt the Jews and on ſome other ſubjects.] Here follow the ſubjects of ſome of them. Philoſophica, prophetica ac thalmudiſtica pro Chriſtiana veritate tuenda, cum juniori Hebræorum Synagoga diſputatio. De ſexcentis & tredecim Moſaicæ ſanctionis ſeu pentateuchi edictis. Farrago ex Thalmudæorum, codice excerpta, ad petitionem Maximiliani Cæſaris. Iſagoge in Cabaliſtarum ſeu allegorizantium eruditionem cum epiſtola contra Stephani Preſbyteri Cabalæ obtrectatoris epiſtolam. De modo orandi in nomine tetragrammato. De novem doctrinarum ordinibus, & totius peripatetici dogmatis nexu compendium. Statera prudentum. Concluſiones, quibus Ariſtotelem triplicem doctrinæ ordinem exercuiſſe, & totius ejus dogmatis nexum dijudicare poteris. He did not forget the uſual topicks of declamations at that time; he making a ſpeech to animate the Germans to wage war againſt the Turks; in virulentam immaniſſimamque Turcarum rabiem, ad principes, magiſtratus, populoſque Germaniæ oratio (1).

(1) Extracted from Geſner's Epitome, p. 659.

[B] See his elogium in a letter of Eraſmus.] It is the laſt of the firſt book, and dated the tenth of March 1516, and the following paſſage is contained in it. Paulus Ricius ſic me proximo colloquio rapuit, ut mira quædam me ſitis habeat, cum homine ſæpius ac familiarius conferendi ſermonem. Præter Hebrææ linguæ peritiam, quantum ille tenet philoſophiæ, quantum Theologiæ: tum quæ animi puritas, qui diſcendi ardor, qui docendi candor, quæ diſputandi modeſtia? Mihi ſanè vir ille primo ſtatim guſtu placuit olim Papiæ, cum illic philoſophiam profiteretur: nunc propiùs intuito magis etiam placet. Is demùm verè mihi videtur Iſraelitam agere, ſuoque cognomini pulchrè reſpondere: cujus omnis voluptas, omnis cura, omne otium ac negotium, in divinis eſt literis. Dignus nimirum animus, cui otium contingat quàm maximè honorificum (2). i. e. " I was ſo vaſtly delighted " with the laſt converſation I had with Paul Ricius,
" that I have a ſtrong deſire of enjoying his com" pany more frequently and familiarly. Not to " mention his great ſkill in the Hebrew tongue, his " knowledge in Philoſophy and Divinity; how great
" is his rectitude of mind, how ardent his thirſt
" after knowledge, how great his candour in teach" ing, and his modeſty in diſputations! I was charm-
" ed with him the very firſt time I ſaw him for" merly at Pavia, where he was Profeſſor of Philo-
" ſophy; and I am ſtill more delighted with him,
" now I have an opportunity of ſeeing him nearer at " hand. In a word, he appears to me a true Iſraelite,
" and to anſwer admirably well to his name; ſince
" his only pleaſure and care are in the ſtudy of the " ſacred writings, and in them his buſy and leiſure
" hours are employed. His caſt of mind is ſuch as " deſerves the moſt honourable leiſure." Ricius ſent him his treatiſe on the Cabala, and received ſuch thanks for it as reflect the higheſt honour on him; for saries; and the subject of their dispute was, whether the Heavens are animated. Ricius maintained the affirmative; and advanced some sentiments that were thought paradoxical [C].

(2) Eraſm. Epiſt. ult. lib. 1. p. 88.

for he shews that this proselyte, in defending one of his friends who had been grievously slandered, had not proceeded beyond the bounds of moderation, nor employed any injurious expressions. Arrisit animus iste Gratiis & amicitiæ natus, qui tanto studio tuetur hominis eruditissimi innocentiam, adversus impudentissimos sycophantas. Arrisit denique te, hoc est absoluto veroque philosopho, digna moderatio: quâ sic fortiter patrocinaris amico, ut à convitiis in adversarium temperes, magis reputans quid te, quàm quid illo dignum esset (3). i. e. "I was vastly pleased with that happy spirit, "born for friendship, which supports with so much "zeal the innocence of a very learned man, against "the most impudent slanderers. Lastly, I was vastly-"pleased with your moderation, so worthy of a true "and complete Philosopher, that is of yourself; for "you defend your friend with so much bravery, that "you refrain from railing at his adversary; consi-"dering with yourself what is fit for you to say, ra-"ther than what he deserves to hear."

(3) Erasm. Epist. 39. lib. 13. p. 642. It was writ in 1520.

[C] Whether the heavens are animated. Ricius maintained the affirmative; and advanced some sentiments that were thought paradoxical.] A Protestant Divine observes, that the opinions of Ricius favoured the principles of magic; and that nevertheless his books de cœlesti agricultura had been approved and applauded by the faculty of Divines of Bologna, Padua, Ferrara and Pavia. Paulus Ritius dum cœlorum animationem & Cabalisticam suam Arithmantiam per decem enumerationes tradit, magiæ principia non parum promovet in commentariis suis ad librum R. Joseph Castiliensis qui porto lucis dicitur, & tamen libros illos de cœlesti agricultura magnifico elogio approbarunt Academiæ Theologicæ Bononiensis, &c (4). John Eckius did not imitate those Divines of Italy; he asserting that the doctrine, which asserts that the heavens are animated, is ridiculous, execrable, and contrary to the faith (5). Claudius Espensæus, who informs me of this particular, did not know the reasons on which this censure of John Eckius is grounded; he not having seen Eckius's book, and knew it only by its refutation by Ricius, an extract of which he gives us. He says (6), that this writer asserted three things; 1. That the doctrine, which declares that the heavens are animated, does not concern faith; for it cannot be either proved or refuted by the principles of Religion, and for this reason the Doctors are divided on this problem. 2. That the affirmative suits better than the contrary doctrine with the words of the Prophets. 3. That reason suggests to us that the heavens are not inanimate beings (7). Espencæus examines Ricius's proofs, and criticizes them; and at last declares it his opinion, that it is safer to deny than to affirm that the heavens have a soul. The reader will perhaps be pleased to find in this place the occasion, which prompted him to publish his work de Cœlorum animatione (8). There was a design of printing, in Paris, an edition of all Cardinal Contarinus's works; but the Divine who was to give them his approbation, did not dare to do it upon finding the opinion with regard to the soul of the heavens in it (9). He thereupon consulted Claudius Espencæus, who answered that he thought it an inconsiderable difficulty; and who remembring, a little after, that he had collected several matters on that question, digested them in a proper form (10).

(4) Gisb. Voetius, desperata Causa Papatus, lib. 1. sect. 4. p. 36. He cites in compend. de anima cæli et cælesti agricultura, lib. 4.

(5) Joannes Eckius positionem hanc ludicram prorsus & exoticam, execrabilem, & à fide exorbitantem esse censuit in tractatu de prædestinatione. Claudius Espensæus, in Tractatu de cœlorum animatione, cap. 5. p. m. 49.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Idem, ibid. chap. 8. p. 70.

(8) It was printed at Paris in 1571.

(9) In book 1. of Contarinus de animæ immortalitate, printed at Venice in 1525.

(10) See the preface to this treatise of Claudius Espensæus.

It is to be observ'd; that, among the school Divines and Philosophers, the question is chiefly to know, whether the immediate mover of the celestial spheres is a soul properly so called, and forma informans. This is the opinion of some, and it is commonly rejected; but as for the opinion of such persons as admit of moving intelligences, as assisting forms, it is almost universally received; and to speak my thoughts, it is my opinion that one cannot do without them; and I fancy that the followers of Copernicus will be forced to adopt it, with regard to their planets, one time or other. Father Daniel (11) and Mr. le Clerc (12) have proposed some difficulties to their system, which puzzle them very much. Mr. Newton (*) and some others have so strongly attacked the opinion of the vortices, that the general laws of motion are not alone sufficient to account for the phænomena. The peculiar direction of an intelligent being would come in very seasonably here.

(11) In his Voiage du Monde de Des Cartes.

(12) In his Physicks.

* Sir Isaac Newton.

RIGORISTS is the name given in the Spanish Low Countries to the Jansenists, to the fathers of the oratory, and in general to all those whose maxims are most opposite to a loose morality (a). A person of Prateolus's turn would form a sect of those casuists, to insult the Church of Rome with regard to the divisions that reign in it. They are falsely accused of enjoining their penitents to eat hay; and young maidens to put on wet shifts [A], a circumstance which is said is the death of some of them (b).

(a) The way or method of these people is called Rigorism.

(b) See Difficultez proposées à Mr. Steyaert, part. 1. p. 33.

RIMINI

[A] They are falsely accused of enjoining . . . . young maidens to put on wet shifts.] I believe no casuist of good sense, how severe soever he might be, would ever enjoin such a penance to a maiden, though it should be in order to suppress very violent temptations to lewdness; but there are some people whose judgment is so greatly depraved by a rigid system of morality, that it is not altogether improbable that some young creatures may have been treated in this manner, who discovered too many frailties at confession; and since Francis d'Assisi thought it proper for himself to have a wife of snow (1), he might have prescribed a wet shirt to others.

(1) See article FRANCOIS d'Assisi, rem. [B].

I read a memorial printed at Delft in 1696, and containing a succinct answer to the three charges of Jansenism, Rigorism, and Innovation. The Author there sets forth the maxims of Christ Jesus, and afterwards speaks as follows (2): "If those who are "called Rigorists lay down to themselves more rigo-"rous maxims, conduct themselves in a manner that "is harder to flesh and blood, and practise such a "severity as goes beyond that wholesom severity, "they deserve to be punished. But if it be true, on "the contrary, as it is certain and manifest, that the "tenderness and softness of most Christians oblige "them to content themselves with much less, and to "submit to the infirmity of human nature, in the "application of these holy rules; it is highly un-"just, and a calumny which deserves to be punished, "to exclaim against them as persons who establish "cruel and excessively severe maxims. And it is yet "truer, that those who oppose in their own persons, "what is called rigorism, oppose in reality the Gos-"pel itself. It is therefore certain, that rigorism is "merely a phantom, by which some would scare the "world, in order to destroy good people, and the "true servants of CHRIST JESUS. Mr. Steyaert "owns this himself, in his theses on the rituals, pub-"lished a few years since; he therein giving the fol-"lowing testimony, which ought not to be suspected, "that those who endeavour to practise the injunctions of "the Church, in the direction of their souls, are those "who are called rigorists, and that he does not know of "any others . . . . (3). It is certain, on the con-"trary, that the loose morality contrary to this rigo-"rism is but too real (4). Mr. Steyaert acknow-"ledges this in his thesis concerning moral Divinity "corrected; for after having proved it by the words "of Pope Alexander VII. cited above, he adds: "what would certain persons do, or rather what "would they not do, had they something like this "to alledge against rigorism; whereas, in order to "prove it, they can offer nothing but a parcel of "idle stories, as about hay, wet shifts, prescribed by "way of penance?"

(2) A memorial printed at Delft, 1696. in 4to. p. 11.

(3) Memorial, p. 14.

(4) Ibid.

[A] He

RIMINI (GREGORIO DE), is known by that name, and by that of Arimini, becauſe he was of Arimini a city of Italy. He taught in the Univerſity of Paris with very great applauſe (a). He was one of the moſt ſubtle ſchool-men of the 14th century; and the acuteneſs of his genius made him addict himſelf much more to the party of the Nominaliſts than to the ſect of the Realiſts (b). He was an Auſtin Frier, and was created General of the Order, at Montpellier in May 1357. He had been their chief Profeſſor in the Convent of Arimini in 1351, and died at Vienna in Auſtria in 1358. His chief works are, Commentaries on Peter Lombard, called the maſter of the ſentences, and on St. Paul's Epiſtles. He was no leſs diſtinguiſhed for the ſanctity of his life, than for his learning and genius; and he is ranked among thoſe who have been beatified (c). I muſt take ſome notice of his opinions. He diſputed ſtrongly againſt thoſe Divines who affirm that, by the Almighty Power, it may happen that two contrary propoſitions, concerning one and the ſame thing, may be true at the ſame time (d). I cannot conceive how he dared to doubt of a doctrine like that, which is an unavoidable conſequence of the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation. He came much nearer to the orthodox doctrine of St. Auſtin, with regard to Free-will, than moſt of the Divines of his time (e): and he even aſſerted, that an invincible ignorance does not juſtify a man [A], but he inculcated

(a) Elſius, in Encomiaſtico Auguſtiniano, p. 247.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) Ex eodem, ibid.

(d) See Fonſeca, on Ariſtotle's Metaphyſicks. lib. 4. chap. 3. p. m. 651.

(e) See the Scholaſticus Orthodoxus of Paul Ferri, p. 304, 447.

[A] He even aſſerted, that an invincible ignorance does not juſtify a man.] Arnauld makes this remark in the ninth part of the difficulties propoſed to Mr. Steyaert, on occaſion of a decree of Pope Alexander VIII. which condemns thirty one propoſitions, the ſecond whereof is this: Tametſi detur ignorantia invincibilis juris naturæ; hæc in ſtatu naturæ lapſæ operantem ex ipſa non excuſat à peccato formali. i. e. "Notwithſtanding there is ſuch an ignorance of the "law of nature as is invincible, nevertheleſs that "ignorance, in the ſtate of corrupt nature, does not "excuſe from the commiſſion of a formal ſin, thoſe "who commit what the law of nature forbids (1)." Arnauld afterwards mentions three opinions: 1. that a human action is not a formal ſin, if he who commits it does not know that he ſins (2). He aſcribes this opinion to the Jeſuits, and affirms that they declare that they aſſert nothing but what is reaſonable; becauſe it is univerſally agreed, as they ſuppoſe, that invincible ignorance juſtifies a man; and that a man is ſuppoſed to be invincibly ignorant that what he does is ſin, when he has no ſuch thought in doing it (3). The ſecond opinion is that of "ſeveral Divines, who, to prevent the over-"turning, by thoſe falſe ſubtleties, the following im-"portant maxim, that the ignorance of the law of "nature does not juſtify a man with regard to the "committing of a ſin, which has been acknow-"ledged by the Heathens themſelves; and laid "down in the canon law, in the following words: "Ignorantia juris omnibus adultis damnabilis eſt, i. e. "Ignorance of the law is damnable in all adult per-"ſons; maintain, that it ought not to be conſidered "as invincible, abſolutely ſpeaking, becauſe that law "is ſuch, that man has been created capable of "knowing it, and that he would have known it had "he continued in the ſtate in which God placed him. "That in the ſtate in which he now is, it is one of "the conſequences of original ſin, that he ſcarce "knows any thing but the firſt principles of it, and "that he is ignorant of the reſt, which he neverthe-"leſs may know when aſſiſted by the divine grace; "which, according to St. Thomas, is ſufficient to ob-"lige men to do what they cannot do without grace, "though this grace, without which they cannot do "it, is given to ſome out of mercy, and denied to "others out of juſtice, as a puniſhment of a preced-"ing ſin, though it were but original ſin. Nothing "can be more expreſs than what the angelical Doc-"tor teaches on this ſubject, 2, 2. q. 2. art. 5. (4)." According to the ſecond opinion, which is that of almoſt all the ancient Divines, the ignorance of the law of nature never juſtified any perſon with regard to ſin, becauſe it ought not to be conſidered as invincible (5). "The third opinion is of Gregorio de Rimini, Eſ-"tius, and other Divines, who, taking the word in-"vincible in another ſenſe, do not ſcruple to aſſert, "that the ignorance of the law of nature does not "excuſe from the commiſſion of a ſin, even when it "might be conſidered as invincible. For it may be "called, ſay theſe, invincible, with reſpect to hu-"man means, ſuch as inſtruction, which many per-"ſons have failed of, particularly among the infi-"dels (6). . . . Thoſe who, in taking the word in-"vincible in this ſenſe, have acknowledged that an "infinite number of Heathens have been invincibly "ignorant of ſeveral duties of the law of nature, "ought neceſſarily to ſay, that the ignorance of the "law of nature does not juſtify a perſon with regard "to the committing of ſin, even when it may be "called invincible with regard to the want of human "and even divine means, when God does not give "thoſe which would be immediately neceſſary to "overcome that ignorance. There are ſtill ſome "theſes publickly maintained at Rome in this age, "in the ſchool of the Auguſtins at Rome, in which "is the following propoſition: Ignorantia invincibilis "juris naturalis non excuſat à peccato. Ex Gregorio in "2. Sent. diſp. 29. qu. 1. art. 2. in reſp. ad arg. "ubi ait. Ad probationem: Secundùm omnes Doctores "non imputantur homini quæ ex ignorantia ſimpliciter "invincibili committuntur: dico quod iſtud eſt intelligen-"dum de ignorantia quæ non eſt peccatum nec pœna pec-"cati, cujus ille ſit vel fuerit reus. Quod probat ex "S. Aug. in Ep. ad Sixtum. Ignorantia enim invin-"cibilis eſt pœna peccati Originalis, cujus omnis homo "naſcitur reus. It is therefore not long ſince, that it "was not thought amiſs to have it publickly aſſerted "in Rome, that an invincible ignorance of the law "of nature did not juſtify a perſon with reſpect to "ſin; nor that it was thought to impoſe upon St. "Auſtin, to aſcribe this ſentiment to him, as well "as to Gregorio de Rimini, one of his moſt faith-"ful diſciples among the ſchoolmen. This was alſo "expreſly taught by Eſtius (7)." Arnauld adds (8), that the difference between the two laſt opinions is only a diſpute about words; and that both of them, in the main, agree perfectly with the general maxim of the Canon-law, and the doctrine of St. Auſtin againſt the Pelagians, and of St. Bernard againſt Abelard, that whatever is done againſt the law of Nature is a ſin, in what manner ſoever a perſon may be ignorant of it, becauſe it is always by way of puniſhment for ſome ſin, as St. Auſtin obſerves in the letter to Sixtus. But as to the firſt, which is that of the Jeſuits, it abſolutely overthrows the maxim of the Canon-law, and the doctrine of the Saints, by aſſerting, in general, on one hand, that invincible ignorance always juſtifies with regard to ſin; and, on the other, by ſtretching ſo far, whenever they pleaſe, the word invincible, that to ſpeak ſincerely, they ought to ſay that ſins committed through ignorance are not formal, but only material ſins.

I was willing to quote all theſe particulars, not only becauſe they afforded us a ſhort and uſeful inſtruction on a very difficult and moſt important ſubject, but alſo becauſe they may ſhew that our Gregory of Arimina did not ſeek for evaſions and ſubterfuges. He dived to the bottom of a tenet or doctrine, he ſaw the moſt juſt conſequences of a principle, and owned them boldly, without ſeeking for any equivocal or ſoftening expreſſions. I do not ſay this, as tho' I condemned thoſe who endeavour to ſoften what they think might ſhock a Reader. They may mean well; and ſome ſubjects are ſo difficult and intricate, that thoſe perſons ought to be excuſed, who ſometimes take a different way in explaining them. The queſtion with regard to ſins of ignorance, is of this

(1) Difficultez propoſées a Monſieur Steyaert, part. 9. p. 234.

(2) Ibid. p. 235.

(3) Ibid. p. 236.

(4) Ibid.

(5) Ibid. p. 241.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Ibid. p. 242.

(8) Ibid. p. 243, 244.

inculcated a principle that was objected to Des Cartes, and which would be very ſcandalous, if a favourable interpretation was not put upon it; he teaching that God may lie or deceive [B]. In Holland, a Proteſtant Miniſter was greatly inveighed againſt, for making kind, and is ſurrounded with precipices on all hands. We therefore muſt not wonder that thoſe who walk in ſuch a road, ſometimes turn aſide or go back. They grant a thing, and afterwards they themſelves combat it. What they give with one hand, they take away with the other. They will own, that an invincible ignorance excuſes men both with regard to fact and right (9), and then they will alledge a numberleſs multitude of examples, borrowed from the ſcriptures, to ſhew that ſins of ignorance do not excuſe or juſtify; and the neceſſary reſult of the examples they quote will be, either that the ignorance of moral duties was never invincible, or that, though it be invincible, it does not excuſe or juſtify the ſinner. If we follow all their proofs, we ſhall find, that after having ſuppoſed that the ignorance of the right and ignorance of the fact are criminal only, when they are invincible (10), they do not leave, properly ſpeaking, any caſe in which this ignorance is invincible (11); for they ſay, it may be overcome with reſpect to the paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt (12), even with regard to perſons who never heard of it. They ſay, that if an American ſavage is ignorant of the facts contained in the New Teſtament, it is his fault; becauſe he did not put himſelf in a diſpoſition, that may incline God to reveal to him the myſteries of ſalvation, and has rendered himſelf unworthy of that celeſtial favour. Put this queſtion to them, was it poſſible for him to have the good diſpoſitions you ſpeak of? Could he make a good uſe of the light of nature? To this they will reply, that he could, if he would. In caſe you aſk, whether it was poſſible for him to have ſuch a will, I believe they will anſwer, he could not; but that it was only a moral impotency, which is no other than the depraved diſpoſition of his will (13), and a conſequence of the corruption in which the children of Adam are born. It is, in the main, the ſame doctrine as that of our Gregory; and it probably would be better to ſay plainly, as he does, that invincible ignorance does not excuſe or juſtify, when it proceeds from original ſin, and that it is a puniſhment of it. It muſt be confeſſed, that this doctrine muſt be liable to ſome inconveniencies, for it ſeems to lead one, ſtep by ſtep, to the following aſſertion, neither frenzy, nor madneſs, can excuſe or juſtify, ſince they ought not to be excluded from the number of evils which ſin has introduced, and which ſerve as a puniſhment to ſin. But is not the firſt opinion mentioned by Arnauld attended with many inconveniencies (14)? Is the queſtion to chooſe between an opinion free from all intricacy, and one that is very intricate? Is not the queſtion to chooſe between two extremes, one of which is repugnant to philoſophical notions, and the other to theological ſyſtems?

(9) See the preface to the ſupplement of Commentaire Philoſophique ſur contrain les d'entrer, folio  4 verſo & ſeq.

(10) See Reflexions de Mr. Saurin ſur les Droits de la Conſcience, p. 16.

(11) i. e. as to the doctrines of right and fact relating to religion.

(12) Saurin, Reflexion ſur la Conſcience, p. 15.

(13) Idem, ibid. p. 16.

(14) See Difficultez propoſees à Mr. Steyaert, part. 9. p. 244 & ſeq.

[B] He teaching that God may lie or deceive.] Des Cartes eſtabliſhed, as the only foundation of human knowledge, the perſuaſion, which mankind ought to have, that God cannot deceive nor be deceived. It was objected to him that (15), according to Gregory of Arimini, and ſome other ſchoolmen, God may ſay or advance ſome things, which are contrary to his intention and decrees, as when he commanded Jonas to declare in Niniveh, that it ſhould be deſtroyed in forty days. If he hardened and blinded Pharaoh; if he ſent a lying ſpirit into ſome Prophets, how do you know (was Des Cartes aſked,) whether he is not capable of ſeducing us? May he not behave to us, as a phyſician does with regard to his patients, and a father towards his children? Theſe are very often impoſed upon, with great wiſdom, and for their good. Could we be able to behold truth, ſhould God preſent it to us naked? Si Deus puram nobis oſtenderet veritatem, quis eam oculus, quæ mentis acies ſuſtinere valeat (16)? Des Cartes anſwered (17), that a diſtinction ought to be made between God's manner of ſpeaking adapted to man's capacity, and to the truths relative to human nature, and the forms of ſpeaking which relate to abſolute truths. The firſt forms of ſpeaking are frequent in the ſacred writings, but the laſt ought to be thoſe of Philoſophers. The hardening of Pharaoh's heart, and ſuch like, do not denote a poſitive effect of God, that being only a privation of grace. It is plain, added he, that I did not mean ſuch lies as conſiſt in words, but the inward and formal malice which conſiſts in deceit. The decree againſt Niniveh was merely comminatory, and depended on a condition. However, I do not blame thoſe, continued he (18), who ſay that God, by the miniſtry of his Prophets, give out lies free from all malicious deceit; and like to thoſe Phyſicians, who, to cure their patients, impoſe falſhoods upon them. I confeſs much more, that the natural inſtinct which God has given us, really deceives us ſometimes; for the nature which God has given us, to preſerve our bodies, poſitively prompts dropſical perſons to do a thing that is prejudicial to them, I mean, to drink. But I have explained, (continues Des Cartes) in my ſixth meditation, how this may be conſonant to the goodneſs or veracity of God.

(15) See Secondes Objections contre les Meditations de Mr. Des Cartes, p. m. 66.

(16) Object. ſecundæ contra Meditat. Carteſii, p. m. 66.

(17) See Des Cartes's Anſwer to the ſecond Objections, p. m. 75, 76.

I ſhall obſerve, by the way, that notwithſtanding this anſwer of Des Cartes, the objection continues ſtill victorious; for the inſtant a perſon is obliged to own, that a general maxim, which had been given for the foundation of a certain and demonſtrative doctrine, admits many exceptions; it is thereby ſo much ſhaken, that it is no longer capable of fixing our uncertainty; and there is no caſe, in which a ſceptic may not employ Des Cartes's diſtinction. If I was deceived, will he ſay, by the ideas which repreſent matter to me as an extended ſubſtance, this would be a falſity exempt from all maliciouſneſs; and poſſibly too it might be of advantage to my preſent ſtate, which, in certain reſpects, is a true ſtate of infancy or ſickneſs, whilſt my ſoul continues united to my body. A verbal lie is not better than an ideal lie, and cannot be abſtracted from it; for the deſign of ſpeaking is only to excite ideas in the mind of the hearers; and cannot ſuppoſe that all ideas relate, not to abſolute truths, but to truths relative to human nature?

I alſo will obſerve, by the way, that there are in ſcripture certain facts and phraſes, that will always confound the deepeſt metaphyſicians. We have an example of this here. See how Des Cartes was run down by the hypotheſis, which Gregorio Arimini pretended to ground on the ſcriptures. We may natually ſuppoſe, that his ſurprize was great, when he found that the thunder which fell upon his work came from the place where he leaſt expected it. He imagined that he had built on a rock, for his edifice was built upon God's infallibility. He doubtleſs had flattered himſelf with having the approbation of the Divines, with regard to that fundamental part of his hypotheſis; and he at leaſt was firmly perſuaded, that he would not be attacked with paſſages from ſcripture. Nevertheleſs the ſtorm came upon him from that quarter; and the ſtorm was ſo violent, that he was forced to fly. So vain are the thoughts and hopes of man. However, we may be ſurprized on the other hand, that Des Cartes ſhould make no greater oppoſition to that attack. The eaſineſs, with which he ſubmitted, is a proof that he was no ways acquainted with books of divinity. Had he been uſed to ſtudy them, he would have known a great number of explications and ſolutions of paſſages of ſcripture, which ſerved as a foundation to Gregory de Rimini, and had there found a method of diſputing which would have brought him off. Some will probably anſwer, that I am miſtaken, and that he could ſcarce have made uſe of this method; for he allowed of nothing but evident reaſons, and always preferred what is more clear, to what is leſs ſo. Now the texts of ſcripture that were objected to him are infinitely clearer, than the ſolutions and gloſſes of the Commentators, and this was the reaſon why he laid down his arms ſo ſoon. If this objection ſhould be made to me, I have a reply ready; and ſhall begin with obſerving, that this great Philoſopher ought, at leaſt, to have inſiſted more than he did on the nature of the expreſſions, which the ſacred Writers have employed, to adapt themſelves to the underſtanding of the making the like assertion, but with some restrictions which took away all the evil of it [C].

(18) Nolim tamen reprehendere illos, qui concedunt Deum per Prophetas verbale aliquod mendacium (qualia ſunt illa medicorum, quibus ægrotos decipiunt ut ipſos curent hoc eſt in quo deſit omnis malitia deceptionis) proferre poſſe. Quinimo etiam, quod majus eſt, ab ipſo naturali inſtinctu qui nobis à Deo tributus eſt, interdum nos realiter falli videmus, ut cum hydropicus ſitit, &c. Carteſius, ibid. p. 76. I am to obſerve that Vogelſang, Neceſſaria Reſponſio ad Præfat. Ludovici Wolzogii, cap. 2. p. 59 & ſeq. inveighs with great vehemence againſt this paſſage of Des Cartes, as tho' it overthrew the ſcriptures, and even the whole Carteſian ſyſtem.

RINUCCINI

the common people. As the mind of these are incapable of raising themselves to the sublimity of the supremely-perfect Being, the Prophets were obliged to bring God down to man, and make him stammer with us, as a nurse stammers with the child to whom she gives suck. To this is owing so many expressions of scripture, which declare that God repents, that he is angry, that he will enquire if a thing happened; will change his intention according as man obeys or does not obey him, and a thousand such things, inconsistent with sovereign perfection. Des Cartes did not fail to represent the difference there is between this way of speaking and that of a true metaphysician; but he touched too lightly upon it, and deprived himself of the several advantages he might have gained from it; he yielding nevertheless to Rimini's pretensions. However, he ought not to have done this, but should have affirmed constantly and invariably, that the passages of scripture, in which it is asserted that God sometimes deceives, ought never to be understood literally; but ought to be explained in the same manner as those which ascribe to him repentance, or some other human quality or frailty. He should have gone on to shew, that a Philosopher ought not to have regard to such passages in the word of God when the greatness of the supreme Being is to be represented. Mr. Regis was perfectly sensible of this. "I will lay it down as a "maxim, says he (19), that whenever I intend to "speak of God in an accurate manner, I must not "consult myself, nor speak in the usual forms; but "raise my mind above all creatures, to consult the "vast and immense idea of the infinitely perfect Be"ing: so that I may be allowed to say, in a moral "treatise, that God has repented, is angry, &c. But "these or such like expressions must not be permitted "in a treatise purely metaphysical, in which a Wri"ter must express himself with accuracy."

(19) Regis, Systeme de Philosophie, Tom. 1. p. 168. Lyons edit. 1691, 12mo.

It also must be remembered, that if the scripture very often represents God under popular or vulgar and consequently very false notions, to adapt itself to the capacity of those minds to whom God designed revelation; it furnishes us elsewhere with the corrective we may want, I mean the description of the infinite Being, in his immutable and infinitely perfect Majesty.

[C] In Holland a Protestant Minister was greatly inveighed against, for making the like assertion, but with some restrictions which took away all the evil of it.] The person I mean is Mr. de Wolzogue. He was Professor and Minister of the Walloon Church at Utrecht, in 1666, when a book was published entitled Philosophia S. Scripturæ Interpres, Exercitatio paradoxa. The orthodox Divines thought it a pernicious work, and worse than those of the Socinians. Mr. de Wolzogue was one of those who refuted him, but in so unlucky a manner, that his refutation (20) was as much, or more inveighed against, than the book he attempted to refute. Here follows one of the passages that gave the greatest offence, which I shall quote from the author's translation (21). "It follows, in the third "place, that I prove that God will not even deceive "or impose upon any one, though I need not take "much pains to prove it. It is sufficient that God "said a thing, to induce us to believe that he will "not impose upon us. I say that he will not im"pose upon us, that no one may suppose but that "he could do this if he pleased. For as any one, "who endeavours to impose upon another, is suppos"ed, in some measure, to be superior to him in "that particular; and to surpass him either in ge"nius, strength, or any faculty whatsoever; and be"cause God's wisdom as well as his power, and all "the rest of his attributes are infinite; it is plain "that, even the most perfect creatures may, because "they are finite as being creatures, be led into "error by the Creator who is infinite. However, "I deny that he will do it. For we can scarce "figure to ourselves an intention of deceiving, but "we must suppose, either that some malice is joined "to it, whereby we endeavour to impose upon a per"son whom we dare not attack without cunning "and deceit; or that there is some weakness of "mind, which makes such a person doubt that he "otherwise would not be able to succeed. Now as "both these things denote a great imperfection, they "must not be ascribed in any manner to him whom "we consider as a most perfect Being, because all the "perfections imaginable are comprehended in his "person (22)." Those who attacked Mr. de Wolzogue (23), inveighed very strongly against the following proposition, God might deceive if he thought proper to do it. It certainly sounds ill; and though the explication, which the author added to it, reduced it to the common opinion of the orthodox Divines, that it is impossible God should deceive any person, he nevertheless had better have refrained from using those offensive words, which in the main had nothing to do with the affair in question, and only formed a needless parenthesis. In my opinion, persons who wrote with temper, would have carried their censure no farther; except that they, perhaps, might have added the following criticism, that an author who seems to adhere so strongly to des Cartes ought not to employ circumlocutions, to say that God cannot deceive, but should say this in two words, and not in circumlocutions that require explanation. Those who express themselves thus, the reprobate might love God, if they would; but their corruption is so great, that they cannot be willing to love God, say, in the main, the same thing, as such who roundly affirm, that it is impossible a reprobate should love God. As this last proposition is shorter, it is therefore better. In like manner, since it is shorter to say, God cannot deceive, than to say, he might deceive if he pleased; but his Holiness is so great that he cannot have an inclination to deceive; why did Mr. de Wolzogue search for so many windings and turnings? However this be, he has more reason to be surprized that the criticism was not confined within those bounds, than to see that Mr. de Labadie, who, in the name of the Walloon Church of Middleburg, prosecuted Mr. de Wolzogue in the Walloon Synod, dared to accuse him of heterodoxy, for saying that God could not have an intention to deceive us. "Mr. de Labadie has objected to me, in his "Latin piece, as an error contrary to the Scrip"ture; not because I say that God could deceive "us if he would, but because I add, that God can"not deceive us if he would. He accuses me, as "not having said enough on this matter; and as"serts that God will deceive, and can deceive. He "objects the Scripture itself to me and puts this ques"tion to me, What will Wolzogue say to the history "related in Chap. xxii, of the first book of Kings? and "particularly to these words of verse 22? and the "Lord said, thou shalt persuade him, and prevail "also: go forth, and do so. Now therefore be"hold in the mouth of all these thy Prophets, and "the Lord hath spoken evil concerning thee. When "God willed and commanded that Ahab should be "seduced, and put a lying spirit (for in this manner Ju"nius and Tremellius speak) ought he to be charged, in "any manner, with weakness of mind, or malice (24)?" See the margin (25). I will cite another passage, by which we find, that the adversaries of Mr. de Wolzogue were not offended at this temerity of Mr. de Labadie. It is a very long passage; but since it contains a doctrine which clears up, in a very solid manner, the proposition censured, the reader must not wonder at my citing it. It will inform him, both as to the right and the fact. Mr. de Wolzogue therefore writes as follows in the preface to a collection of judgments published by him in 1669 (26).

(22) Wolzogue, Apologie pour le Synode de Naerden, part. 4. p. 160.

(23) See Vander Waeyen, p. 19 of his work, pro vera & genuina Reformatorum sententia præsertim in negotio de Interprete Scripturæ. Mr. Vogelsang, chap. 2. of Necessaria Responsio ad Præfationem Ludovici Wolzogii. John Brown, a Scotch Minister, p. 61. of his Volzogius causæ proditor, and several others.

(24) Wolzogue, Apologie pour le Synode de Naerden, part. 4. p. 154, 155.

(25) It is to be observed, that Mr. de Wolzogue says, that he gave Mr. de Labadie notice, in the Synod of Naerden, of this blunder; and afterwards, added he, he corrected himself; having observed, that it was impious to say God will deceive, and that he really deceives mankind.

(26) That is, Jugemens de plusieurs Professeurs & Docteurs en Theologie qui prononcent Orthodoxe le Livre de Loys de Wolzogue de l'Interprete de l'Ecriture.

"(27) The first objection, and which makes the "greatest noise, is my saying that God can deceive "if he will; for one would conclude from thence, "that I assert that God can deceive. But I believe "that nothing can be so innocent as what I said; "and if it be carefully examined, it will be found "very

(27) Wolzogue, Avant-propos des Jugemens, &c.

(20) It is entitled, De Scripturarum Interprete adversus Exercitatorem paradoxum Libri duo, and was printed in 1667.

(21) The Latin is in p. 24, of the 1st edit. of his book, and p. 11. of the second.

RINUCCINI (OTTAVIO), a Florentine Gentleman (a), followed Mary of Medicis, with whom he was in love, into France [A], and gained the esteem of King Henry

(a) Crescemberi, l'Istoria della volgar Poesia, p. 149.

" very orthodox. For if any thing can be objected " to it, it must be either in the sense or the words. " With regard to the sense, I take it for granted " that it is impossible God should ever deceive, as " it is impossible that he should lie, or forswear him- " self. I say this expressly in several parts of my " book; I make it the foundation of my whole " dispute; and I look upon this truth as so important " that I believe, without it, we cannot have any " assurance of any thing in the world, nor of our " salvation. Nevertheless, to explain the nature of " deceit, I distinguish between a will to deceive, " from the qualities, necessary to execute that deceit. " A will to deceive is always criminal, and properly " contains the imperfection that is in deceit; but " the qualities which might be subservient to the " executing of that deceit are good, and always con- " tain some perfection (28). Let us image to our " selves two men, the one stupid and malicious, " and the other a virtuous and able man: we may " say of the former, that he has a strong desire to " deceive some body, but that he has not wit enough " for it; it is not for want of inclination, but the " power to do it. On the contrary, it would be said " of the second, that he has more than wit sufficient " to impose upon silly people, but that he is too " good a man to do it. Now if we apply this to " God, it is very certain he has no will to deceive; " he cannot have it; he is too perfect to do it, he " being perfection itself; but with regard to the " qualities requisite for executing a deceit, such as " wisdom and power, doubtless God possesses them: " not that he can ever employ his wisdom and " power to execute deceit, for this would always " presuppose a will to deceive; but he nevertheless " possesses that wisdom and power which are requi- " site for the execution of a deceit. And it is in " this sense that I say that God can deceive if he " will; but that he cannot will it; that is to say, " that God cannot deceive, not from any defect of " wisdom or power, but by the perfection of his " will. So that these words, God may deceive if " he will, ought to be paraphrased thus: God is " possessed of all the qualities requisite for deceiving; " he has wisdom, power, constancy; he is possessed " of every thing that might be subservient to the " executing of some deceitful design, in case he had " the will to deceive; but it is impossible for him to " have such a will to deceive; it is also impossible " for him to endeavour to employ his power for the " execution of a deceit, whence I conclude that it " is impossible for him to deceive. The meaning " of this is only, that God is all powerful and all " wise. And who will deny this? But perhaps it " may be said, that there is something harsh in these " words. Supposing this, this could not be so great " a crime as to deserve so much noise to be made " about it. Were all harsh and offensive words to " be struck out from the books of our Divines, there " would be a vast number of rasures. Calvin him- " self could not be free from censure in the article " of Predestination. But with regard to the doctrine " in question, I assert that the Scriptures say more " than I. These say, 1 Kings xxii, that the Lord " has put a lying spirit in the mouth of the false Prophets. " In the xxth of Jeremiah 7, O Lord thou hast de- " ceived me, and I was deceived; for thus it is in the " English translation of the Bible; and has not our " version the following words, Ezekiel xiv, 9. And " if the Prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a " thing, I the Lord have deceived that Prophet? Have " I advanced any thing that seems so strange at first " sight? I nevertheless know what meaning is a- " scribed to these passages; but I wish they also " would have admitted that which I give to my " book, without reproaching me with the appearance " of harshness which is found in the expression. And " a surprizing circumstance is, Mr. de Labadie has " asserted, that God can deceive, that he will de- " ceive, that he has deceived. He charges me with " not saying enough, in asserting that God can de- " ceive if he will, but that he cannot have the will " to do it, and that none of our zealots censure him " for it."

(28) Compare this with rem. [A] of the art. RANGOUZE.

Mr. Wolzogue's adversaries were not satisfied with this explication. Mr. de Vogelsang refuted it in the most indignant and contemptuous manner; and observed, among other particulars, and it is plain Des Cartes stole from the Schoolmen the distinction between the power of deceiving and the will to deceive; as if that power was a kind of perfection, whereas a will to deceive is an imperfection. He declares that Des Cartes was eager to get the fame of being an inventor by raking into the filth of the schoolmen; and he alledges a passage of Ch. V, Book IV of Aristotle's Topicks, in which it is said that the faculty of doing moral evil is in God and in a good man (29). He instances likewise the following words of Thomas Aquinas, which serve as an explication to this passage of Aristotle. Deus peccare non potest, quia est omnipotens. Quamvis Philosophus dicat in quarto Topicorum, quod potest Deus & studiosus (vir probus) prava agere. Sed hoc intelligitur vel sub conditione, cujus antecedens sit impossibile, ut puta, si dicamus quod potest Deus prava agere si velit. Nihil enim prohibet conditionalem esse veram, cujus antecedens & consequens est impossible; sicut si dicatur, si homo est asinus, habet quatuor pedes. Vel, ut intelligatur, quod Deus potest aliqua agere, quæ nunc prava videntur, quæ tamen si ageret, bona essent. Vel loquitur secundum communem opinionem Gentilium, qui homines dicebant transferri in Deos, ut Jovem & Mercurium (30). i. e. " God cannot sin because he is " omnipotent: although the Philosopher (Aristotle) " asserts, in the fourth book of his Topicks, that " God and a good man may do evil. But we must " understand this under a condition whose antecedent " is impossible, as for instance, if we should say that " God can do evil if he will. For nothing hinders " a conditional proposition from being true, though " the antecedent and consequent part of it should be " impossible; as if we should say, if man be an ass, " he has four feet. Or else the Philosopher means, " that God may do some things that now seem evil, " which yet, should he do them, would be good. Or " lastly, he expresses himself agreeably to the com- " mon opinion of the Gentiles, who declared that " men were turned into Gods as Jupiter and Mer- " cury." He asserts that Thomas Aquinas is ridiculous, in endeavouring to justify that reflection of Aristotle. He is vastly severe upon him; but I shall take notice only of what he says on the last point. Quod ultimo loco hariolatur, Aristotelem forte sic locutum fuisse juxta communem opinionem Gentilium, qui homines dicebant transferri in Deos, ut Jovem & Mercurium; quam hoc plane frivolum est? Etenim juxta communem Gentilium opinionem, Dii non modo facultatem habebant mala vel turpissima perpetrandi, sed & promptam sane voluntatem. Quapropter eorum Poëtæ furta Numinum & impostruras, & rixas, & pugnas, & mutuorum odiorum rancores, & libidines, & adulteria vulgo decantavere. Quod plane contra Philosophi scopum & mentem est, qui mala perpetrandi voluntatem Deo penitus abrogat, etsi facultatem prava faciendi concesserit (31). i. e. " As to what he conjectures in the last place, viz. " that perhaps Aristotle expresses himself agreeably to " the common opinion of the Gentiles, who declared " that men were turned into Gods as Jupiter and " Mercury; how frivolous is all this! For, according to " the common opinion of the Gentiles, the Gods were not " only indued with the power, but had also the will to " commit the most shameful actions. This was the rea- " son why their Poets chose, for their common To- " picks, the thefts of their Deities, their cheats, con- " tests, combats; their reciprocal hatred, their lewd- " nesses and adulteries. Now this is directly repug- " nant to the scope and meaning of Aristotle, who " entirely takes from God the will of doing evil, " though he acknowledges that he is indued with " power for that purpose." He adds (32) other passages of Scripture to those which Mr. de Wolzogue had alledged, and shews in what manner they ought to be understood. See the margin (33).

(29) Solet Cartesius e putidissimis antiquorum Peripatheticorum atque Scholasticorum liberalius ineptientium sordibus excrementa præcipue fœdiora sæpenumero deligere, uti de placitis obsoletis, & merita sepulturæ oblivione, subtilitatis insolitæ miser gloriolam subripiat. Reinerus Vogelsangius, Vianensis V. D. M. & S. S. Theologiæ Professor in Ecclesia & Gymnasio Sylvaducensi, ad Præfation. Lud. Wolzogii necessaria Responsa. P. 49.

(30) Thomas Aquin. 25. quæst. art. 3. apud Vogelsang. ibid. p. 51.

(31) Vogelsang. ibid. p. 52.

(32) Ibid. p. 69.

(33) It is to be observed, that the Walloon Synod pronounced Mr. de Wolzogue's book orthodox.

[A] He followed Mary of Medicis, with whom he was in love, into France.] We learn this particular

Henry IV. who appointed him one of the Gentlemen of his Bed-chamber (b). He was a man of wit and genius, handſome, polite, eloquent, and a very good Poet, and with the advantages of theſe ſhining qualities, he attached himſelf very much to the Ladies (c). His inventions enriched the Italian poetry in a very ſingular manner, he being the firſt who wrote poems in Anacreon's manner, and compoſed pieces that were ſet to muſic, and played on the ſtage (d) [B]. It muſt indeed be owned, that all Authors are not univerſally agreed that he was the inventor of thoſe two things; ſome affirming that Giabriele Chiabrera gave riſe to Anacreontic ſongs (e), and Æmilio Caveleri, a Gentleman of Rome, had writ Operas before Rinuccini (f). However this be, it cannot be denied but that the dramatic pieces of the latter greatly ſurpaſſed whatever had been done in that kind, with regard to the pomp of the machinery, the decoration of the ſcenes, and

(b) Fu Gentiluomo della Camera del Re Criſtianiſſimo. Jacobo Rilli, Notizie Letterarie ed Iſtoriche intorno a gli Uomini illuſtri dell' Accad. Fiorent. part. 1. p. 258.

(c) Nic. Erythræus, Pinac. 1. p. 61, 62.

(d) Creſcembeni, Iſtor. della volgar Poeſia, p. 149.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Nic. Erythræus, Pinac. 1. p. 62.

ticular from Nicius Erythræus.] Mariam' Mediceam, ſays he (1), Galliæ Reginam, non majori ambitione quàm vanitate adamavit: quam etiam honoris gratia, proſecutus eſt euntem in Galliam. Sed poſtea reverſus in Italiam, omiſſis amatoriis nugis, ad quas erat mirè propenſus, tandem ad ſe rediit, quæque ratione non perſpexerat, ſatietate abjecit, experiendo contempſit, totumque ad pietatis amorem & ſtudium animum contulit: in quo demum Florentiæ diem obiit extremum. Here follows Baillet's paraphraſe of this Latin paſſage. "Ottavio Rinuccini . . . is known, in France, on "a very bad account, he having been ſo ſilly and "indiſcreet as to diſcover the motives which engaged him to put himſelf in the retinue of Queen "Mary of Medicis (2). . . . We muſt add, for his "reputation, that he changed his life and practice "in the latter part of his days; that the virtue and "wiſdom of our Queen, which had greatly mortified him, opened his eyes; and being returned to "Italy with a ſincere repentance and a very ſalutary "ſhame, he devoted himſelf to pious exerciſes, which "he did not forſake till his death (3)."

(1) Nic. Eyrthræus, Pinac. 1. p. 62.

(2) Baillet, Jugement ſur les Pietes, num. 1375.

(3) Ibid.

[B] He being the firſt who . . . compoſed pieces that were ſet to muſic, and played on the ſtage.] Nicius Erythræus aſcribes four Operas to him, that of Daphne (4), of Eruydice, of Arethuſa, and of Ariadne (5); but Mr. Rilli makes no mention of Arethuſa, tho' he had made many reſearches concerning this great Poet. He informs us (6) that the Daphne, repreſented before the great Dutcheſs by James Corſi, was printed in Florence in the year 1600 in 4to. That Eurydice, repreſented at the marriage of Mary of Medicis, with Henry IV, was printed in the ſame city in the year 1600, 4to. That the Ariadne, repreſented at the marriage of the Prince of Mantua with the Infanta of Savoy, was printed in the ſame city in the year 1608, 4to. That the Maſcherata dell' Ingrate, an interlude or ballet-dance at the marriage of the Prince of Mantua, was printed at Mantua in the year 1608, in 4to. That the Verſi Sacri cantati nella Cappella della Sereniſſima Arciducheſſa d'Auſtria Granducheſſa di Toſcana, and the Ode in lode de' Giuocatori di pallone, were printed at Florence in 1622, 4to, under the direction of Peter Francis Rinuccini, the Author's ſon. That others are printed in ſingle ſheets, beſides ſonnets, ſongs, &c. inſerted in other people's works; and that there are a very great number of his pieces in manuſcript, that deſerve to be publiſhed. He quotes (7) a paſſage of Peter Francis Rinuccini (8), by which we are told that Ottavio Rinuccini deſerved great commendations for his Verſi Sciolti, in his panegyric on the birth of Lewis XIII, and that he intended to tranſlate the ſix books of St. Catharine into this kind of verſe; but that he tranſlated only the firſt of it; and that they were reſolved to publiſh it, though the Author had not put the laſt hand to it. This is what Rilli ſays concerning Ottavio's works. Could he be ignorant of what related to this Orpera of Arethuſa which Erythræus mentions (9)?

(4) It is Daphnem, inſtead of Daphnem, in Nic. Erythræus.

(5) Nic. Ery- Pinac. 1. p. 101.

(6) Jacobo Rilli, Notizie intorno a gli Uomini illuſtri dell' Accademia Fiorentina, part. 1. p. 258, 260.

(7) Idem, ibid. p. 259.

(8) Extracted from a letter of the academy de gli Alterati.

(9) Obſerve, that in page 145 of the Pinacotheca tertia, he mentions the three others, but not the Arethuſa.

But to come to the point, here follows a long paſſage from the dedication of Eurydice (10). It ſays, that Rinuccini imagined he was the firſt among the moderns, who attempted to introduce muſic on the ſtage; however, he is miſtaken, and did not know what I have related elſewhere (11). We there alſo find that James Peri (12) ſet the Paſtoral entitled Daphne to muſic, and afterwards the Opera of Eurydice. E' ſtata openione di molti, Criſtianiſſima Regina, che gli antichi Greci e Romani cantaſſero ſulle Scene le Tragedie intiere; ma sì nobile maniera di recitare, non che rinnovata, ma nè pur che io ſappia fin quì è ſtata tentata da alcuno; & ciò mi credev' io per difetto della Muſica moderna, di gran lunga all' antica inferiore; ma penſiero sì fatto mi tolſe interamente dall' animo Meſ. Jacobo Peri, quando udito l'intenzione del Sig. Jacopo Corſi, e mia, miſe con tanta grazia ſotto le note la Favola di Dafne, compoſta da me, ſolo per fare una ſemplice prova di quello, che poteſſe il Canto nell' età noſtra, che incredibilmente piacque a que' pochi che l'udirono; onde preſo animo, e data miglior forma alla ſteſſa Favola, e di nuovo rappreſentandola in Caſa il Sig. Jacopo, fu ella non ſolo dalla Nobiltà di tutta queſta Patria favorita, ma dalla Sereniſſ. Granducheſſa, e dagl' Illuſtriſſimi Cardinali dal Monte e Montalto, udita, e commendata; ma molto maggior favore, e fortuna ha ſortito l'Euridice meſſa in Muſica dal medeſimo Peri, con arte mirabile, e da altri non più uſata, havendo meritato dalla benignità e magnificenza del Sereniſſ. Granduca d'eſſere rappreſentata in nobiliſſima Scena, alla preſenza di V. M. del Cardinal Legato, e di tanti Principi, e Signori d' Italia e di Francia; la onde cominciando io a conoſcere quanto ſimili Rappreſentazioni in Muſica ſiano gradite, ho voluto recare in luce queſte due, perchè altri di me più intendenti s'ingegnino di accreſcere, e migliorare sì fatte Poeſie di maniera, che non abbiamo invidia a quelle antiche tanto celebrate da' Nobili Scrittori (13). i. e. "It has been the opinion of many perſons, moſt "Chriſtian Queen, that the ancient Greeks and Romans uſed to ſing their Tragedies throughout; "but ſo noble a way of ſpeaking has not been revived, nor that I know of, yet attempted by any "one, which circumſtance I imagined was owing "to the defects of the modern muſic, which is vaſtly "inferior to that of the ancients. However, Signior "Jacobo Peri made me quite alter my opinion, "when upon hearing Signior Jacobo Corſi's deſign, "as well as mine, he ſo gracefully ſet to muſic the "Paſtoral of Daphne, written by me, merely to "make a trial of what vocal muſic could do in our "age, and it gave inexpreſſible pleaſure to thoſe "few who heard it. Being encouraged by this, and "working up this Paſtoral into a better form, and "repreſenting it anew in Signior Jacobo's houſe, it "was favoured not only by all the nobility of the country, but heard and commended by the moſt Serene "Archducheſs, and the moſt illuſtrious Cardinals dal "Monte and Montalto. But Eurydice has met with "more favour and ſucceſs, the aboveſaid Signior "Peri having ſet it to muſic with wonderful art, "which he himſelf only is maſter of; and having "been thought worthy, by the bounty and great generoſity of the moſt ſerene grand Duke, to be re"preſented in the moſt ſplendid manner on the "ſtage, in preſence of your Majeſty, the Cardinal "Legate, and ſo many Princes and Gentlemen of "Italy and France; from whence, beginning to "find the applauſe which ſuch muſical repreſentations met with, I was determined to publiſh theſe "two, thereby to excite others, who are better ſkilled in theſe things than I am, to carry and improve "this ſpecies of poetry in ſuch a manner, that we "may have no reaſon to envy ſo much thoſe ancient "performances, which noble Writers have ſo much "praiſed." To this I ſhall add a curious paſſage from father Meneſtrier. "Theſe muſical Dramas "were preſerved in carouſals and ballets, the overtures whereof generally conſiſted of dialogues and "narrations of muſicians, who ſung in chariots or "other machines. At laſt Ottavio Rinuccini, a Florentine Poet, having a particular genius for expreſſing in his verſes all kinds of paſſions, endeavoured

(10) To Mary of Medicis, Q. of France.

(11) In the rem. of the art. SULPITIUS (John).

(12) Nic. Erythræus, Pinac. 1. p. 61. calls him Jacobus Pera, but p. 144, of Pinacotheca tertia, he calls him Jacobus Perius.

(13) Ottavio Rinuccini, apud Jacobum Rilli, Notizie intorno a gli Uomini illuſtri dell' Accademia Fiorent. p. 258, 259.

and the ſkilfulneſs of the actors (g). I am of opinion it ſhould not have been affirmed, that he firſt brought ballets or interludes into France [C]. Being returned to Florence, he at laſt grew tired of the follies of love, to which he once had a very ſingular propenſion (b). That which reaſon was not able to effect, was at laſt done by ſatiety and experience, by giving him a contempt for thoſe things in which he had formerly indulged himſelf too much. He turned his eyes inward; and thereupon devoted himſelf entirely to piety, and died in that frame of mind at Florence (i). Several of his Poems were printed there after his death, under the direction of PETER FRANCIS RINUCCINI his ſon, who dedicated them to Lewis XIII. in 1624.

(g) Nic. Erythræus, Pinac. 1. p. 62.

(b) See the rem. [A].

(i) Nic. Erythræus, ubi ſupr.

" voured to adapt muſic and ſinging ſo well to them, " that theſe ſhould not eclipſe any of the beauty of " his verſes, nor prevent their being underſtood, " which are often drowned by the windings, turn- " ings, and quavers of the voice. He diſcourſed on " this ſubject with Giacomo Corſi, a Gentleman of " Florence, who was ſkilled in muſic, and a great " lover of all things in a polite taſte, when both " ſending for Giacomo Cleri (14), and Giulio Cac- " cini, excellent maſters of muſic, they contrived " together a piece (drama) which was repreſented in " Signior Corſi's houſe, in preſence of the great " Duke and Ducheſs of Tuſcany, and Cardinals " Monte and Montalto with ſo much ſucceſs, that " this piece, the ſubject of which was the loves of " Apollo and Daphne, ſerved as the model to Eu- " rydice, which was repreſented not long after in the " ſame place. Claude de Monteverde, an excellent " muſician, compoſed the Ariadne (15) from theſe two " originals; and being appointed maſter of the mu- " ſic of St. Mark in Venice, he there introduced " thoſe Dramas which have become ſo famous, by " the magnificence of the theatres and habits, the " delicacy of the voices, the harmony of the con- " certs, and the learned compoſitions of this Mon- " teverde, Soriano, Giovanelli, Teofilo, and ſeveral " other great maſters (16)."

(14) I fancy there is an error of the preſs here, Cleri for Pleri.

(15) I don't know whether we ought not to have ſaid, that Claude de Monteverde compoſed, not the Ariadne, but the muſic of the Ariadne of Rinuccini. However, this laſt piece ought to have been quoted as well as Daphne and Eurydice.

(16) Meneſtrier, Repreſentat. en Muſique, p. 163 & ſeq.

Any perſon, who is deſirous of knowing the original and progreſs of every art, will read theſe citations with pleaſure. It muſt be obſerved that Rinuccini was not a player (17).

[C] I am of opinion it ſhould not have been affirmed, that the firſt brought ballets or interludes into France.] His ſon applauds him for this: qua fu, ſays he (18), ne' ſuoi Verſi la facilità, quale la dolcezza veramente nata all' armonioſa melodia? Quindi acque, che i Balli, quali egli ancora primiero conduſſe in Francia, accompagnati dalla Muſica piacquero mirabilmente. i. e. " How " eaſy was his verſe, and how great the ſweetneſs, " which was truly adapted to harmonious melody! " To this was owing that the ballets, accompanied " with muſic, which he alſo firſt introduced in " France, met with vaſt applauſe." He came to France with Mary of Medicis in 1600. Now we know that ballets were eſtabliſhed there before that time; and I will give a proof of this which will be very agreeable to thoſe who love to be acquainted with the hiſtory of inventions. Beaujoyeux was " an Italian named Balthaſarini, and was one of the " fineſt fiddles in Europe, whom Marſhal de Briſſac, " when Governor of Piedmont, ſent to the Queen " (19), with the whole band of violins at whoſe head " he was. The Queen appointed him her valet-de- " chambre; and this Balthaſarini, changing his " name to Beaujoyeux, gained ſo much fame by " his inventions of ballads, concerts, feſtivals, and " dramas, that no one was ſpoken of but him. It " was he who compoſed the ballet for the marriage " of Duke de Joyeuſe with Mademoiſelle de Vau- " demont, the Queen's ſiſter, and this ballad was " publiſhed under the following title, Ballet comique " de la Reine, fait aux Noces de Monſieur le Duc de " Joyeuſe & Mademoiſelle de Vaudemont ſa Sœur, par " Baltaſar de Beaujoyeux Valet de Chambre du Roi & " de la Reine ſa Mere. One of the Court Poets wrote " the following verſes in his praiſe:

(17) He was a Player in great reputation at Florence. Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poetes, num. 1375.

(18) In his letter to the academy de gli Alterati, apud Rilli, Notizie intorno a gli Uomini illuſtri dell' Accademia Fiorentina, p. 259.

(19) i. e. Catharine of Medicis.

Beaujoyeux, qui premier des cendres de la Grece
Fais retourner au jour le deſſein & l'addreſſe
Du Balet compaſſé en ſon tour meſuré,
Qui d'un eſprit Divin toy-méme te devance,
Geometre inventif, unique en ta ſcience;
Si rien d'honneur s'acquiert le tien eſt aſſuré.

" Fam'd Beaujoyeux, who firſt from Grecia's aſhes,
" Has caus'd the ballad now to ſhine in France:
" The ballad, form'd by art's moſt pleaſing rules,
" Where in juſt harmony all the parts combine.
" Thou, heavenly genius, who thyſelf excell'ſt:
" Geometrician, who doſt all invent,
" And ſhew'ſt a ſcience known to thee alone.
" If great performances can honour gain,
" Remain aſſur'd that thine will laſt for ever.

(20) Meneſtrier, ubi ſupra.

" Beaulieu and Salmon, maſters of the muſic to his " Majeſty, aſſiſted him in the compoſition of the re- " citatives and ballad airs; part of the verſes were " writ by la Cheſnaye, Chaplain to the King; and " James Patin, King's Painter at that time, painted " the Janes (20)." This ballad was danc'd in 1582 (21). Father Meneſtrier (22) has given a deſcription of the machine with which it was introduced.

(21) Vide the rem. [C] of the art. GOUDIMEL.

(22) In the Traite des Ballets anciens & modernes, p. 267, 268.

RITIUS (MICHAEL), in Italian Riccio, a Neapolitan Civilian, and Author of ſeveral books [A], flouriſhed in the beginning of the 16th Century. He was baniſhed from his native country by the faction which oppoſed France, and withdrew to the Court of Lewis XII. who raiſed him to the employment of Counſellor in the Parliament of Paris (a). La Croix du Maine calls him Michael de Ris, and affirms that he was Counſellor to the King, in his great Council, and in the Parliament of Paris anno 1505, and that he was commonly called the Advocate of Naples (b). When Cardinal d'Amboiſe entered Milan, after Lewis Sforza had been taken priſoner, he appointed Michael Ritius to anſwer the ſpeech made by the inhabitants of Milan, to beg pardon for their diſobedience (c). Lewis XII. ſent our Ritius to Genoa in 1506, to offer the rebellious inhabitants a free pardon (d), but all the arguments of this orator were of no effect.

(a) Baudier, Hiſt. du Cardinal d'Amboiſe, p. 44.

(b) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franc. p. 331.

(c) See Gaguin, book 11, of l'Hiſt. de France, folio m. 308 verſo.

(d) Guicciardin, liv. 7. folio m. 192.

[A] Author of ſeveral books.] He wrote at Blois in 1505, a Treatiſe of the duty of Soldiers, and their privileges, which was printed at Paris the ſaid year, dedicated by him to King Lewis XII. (1). He wrote three books, De Regibus Francorum, three de Regibus Hiſpaniæ, one de Regibus Hieroſolymarum, four de Regibus Neapolis & Siciliæ, and two de Regibus Hungariæ, which John Frobenius printed at Baſil in 1517 in 4to. We there meet with a Preface written by the Author at Rome in 1505; and a Preface of Janus Parrhaſius, who affirms that the diction is pure, unaffected, and natural, purus, candidus, illaboratus (2). Ludovicus Vives declares that there are a great many errors in the proper names in theſe hiſtories of Ritius. Michael Ritius Reges aliquot Chriſtianos collegit, in quo opere multa ſunt locorum, hominum, & familiarum corrupta nomina, vitio credo deſcribentium (3). His Hiſtory of the Kings of France extends from Pharamond to Lewis XII. and was printed at Rome in 1505, and dedicated to Guy de Rochefort, Chancellor of France (4). That of the Kings of Spain begins at Gargoris, and ends with Philip I. father to Charles V. (5).

(1) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franc. p. 331. I muſt obſerve, that du Verdier Vau-Privas does not mention this book.

(2) Taken from Geſner, Bibl. fol. 513.

(3) Ludovicus Vives, de tradendis Diſciplinis, lib. 5. p. 359. edit. Ludg. 1551, 8vo.

(4) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 667.

(5) Vaſæus, Chron. Hiſp. cap. 4. p. 21. edit. Colon. 1577, 8vo.

[A] He

RITTANGELIUS (JOHN STEPHEN), a converted Jew, was a native of Bamberg in Germany, and lived in the 17th Century. He was Profeſſor of the Eaſtern languages in the Univerſity of Koninſberg, and publiſhed ſome books [A], which prove that he was ſincerely zealous for the Chriſtian Religion, and a learned man. He intended to publiſh ſome others, and went for that purpoſe to Amſterdam; but he had the horrid mortification to ſee his manuſcripts torn to pieces by privateers, who took the ſhip he was on board of, a particular he himſelf informs us of in the dedication to his Jezirah. Some ſay that he was born a Jew, and this the Journaliſts of Utrecht declare as a certain fact (a); but others ſay, that he was a Roman Catholick, and afterwards turned Jew, and then turned Proteſtant. Theſe are the words of the Author of Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for Auguſt 1699, p. 212. But ſome perſons think he never profeſſed the Jewiſh Religion [B]. He was living the 31ſt of May 1652, that being the

(a) Bibl. Librorum novorum, Menſ. Sept. and Oct. 1698, p. 684.

[A] He publiſhed ſome books.] He had ſaid in his notes on the book Jezirah (1), that the Chaldaic paraphraſe of the ſcriptures furniſhes ſtrong arguments againſt the Jews and Antitrinitarians, upon which he was attacked by a Socinian, who printed a work under the name of Irenopolita. He defended himſelf in a treatiſe, entitled, Libra veritatis, dedicated to John Caſimir King of Poland. Vander Wayen (2) reprinted it at Franeker 1698, with another treatiſe of the ſame Author concerning the ceremonies of Eaſter. He likewiſe reprinted in the ſame place in 1699, Rittangelius's book, De Veritate Religionis Chriſtianæ, wherein are inſerted a great number of paſſages, which ſhew that the ancient Jewiſh Church believed in the myſtery of the Trinity, and the eternal divinity of the Meſſiah (3). Mr. Wagenſeil (4) publiſhed ſome letters written by Rittangelius to a Jew, and which appeared to him excellent in their kind. Vander Wayen (5) is of opinion, that du Voiſin, who wrote a refutation of the book of the pretended Irenopolita, did not ſucceed ſo well in it as the Proſelyte to Chriſtianity. I muſt add, that ſome of thoſe who are not ſatisfied with Rittangelius's principles, no ſooner knew that a new edition was made of his Libra veritatis, but they publiſhed a manuſcript which had been written many years, and entitled, Bilibra veritatis & rationis, &c. They added to it the diſſertation De Verbo Dei, which had occaſioned Rittangelius's anſwer. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (6).

(1) This is a book which the Jews aſcribe to the Patriarch Abraham, and others to Rabbi Akiba. Rittangelius gave a verſion of it with notes, which was printed at Amſterdam, in 1642.

(2) Profeſſor of Divinity in Franeker.

(3) See the preface of Vander Wayen to Libra veritatis.

(4) In Lipmanni Confutatione. See the preface in queſtion.

(5) See the ſame preface.

(6) For Auguſt 1699. p. 214.

Rittangelius printed at Koniſberg in 1652, his German tranſlation of the Prayers, which the Jews offer up in their Synagogues the firſt day of every year. He dedicated this work to the Elector of Brandenburg; and the dedication dated May the 31ſt 1652, informs us, that he had been indiſpoſed for near a twelve month, and entertained little hopes of a recovery; that he had often deſired to have ſome choice diſciples put under his care, that the talent which God had beſtowed upon him might not die with him, but that he had not been able to obtain that favour; and therefore, notwithſtanding the violence of his indiſpoſition, he had applied himſelf to the German tranſlation of ſome Jewiſh prayers. In his Preface he criticizes ſeveral errors committed by Kircher, Capel, Scaliger, Vechner, Vorſtius, Conſtantine l'Empereur, Slevogtius, Schickard, in their verſions from the Hebrew (7). The Journal which I cited gives us an idea of his infatuation. In eo merito à cordatioribus Theologis reprehendendus, quod ubique ferè jactat, ne apicem quidem ullum vel literam in Novo Teſtamento reperiri, quem non ex Hebræorum antiquitatibus deſumtum demonſtrare ipſe poſſit, & quidem, ut ipſe loquitur, non opinionibus, (quia opinio verſatur circa illa, quæ ſe aliter habere poſſunt) ſed auctoritatibus omnium ſeculorum, tam Judaicæ, quam Chriſtianæ Eccleſiæ & Antiquitatis (1). He affirmed, that there is not a tittle or jot in the New Teſtament but what is borrowed from the Jewiſh Antiquities.

(7) Extracted from the Utrecht Journal, for Sept. and Oct. 1698, p. 675, 677.

(8) Extracted from the Utrecht Journal, for Sept. and Oct. 1698, p. 678.

[B] Some perſons think he never profeſſed the Jewiſh religion.] A manuſcript letter was communicated to me, dated 10 Sept. 1701, out of which I will extract ſome particulars, which, I am perſuaded, will pleaſe the curious.

The Author of this letter was particularly well acquainted with our Rittangelius. He obſerves, 1ſt, that Hornius, Wagenſeil, and ſeveral other Writers affirm, that our Author had been a Jew, and perhaps was born one. 2d, That the anonymous Bilibra veritatis affirms *, that Rittangelius having been brought up in the Romiſh communion, embraced the Jewiſh faith, and was circumciſed, as it is ſaid, at Hamburg; that afterwards he was baptized at Dantzick by Mr. Nigrinus, and devoted himſelf to the Chriſtian belief. 3d, That Chriſtopher Hartknoch, Profeſſor at Thorn, relates †, that Rittangelius was born, as it is ſaid, a Chriſtian, and baptized into the Chriſtian church, afterwards turned Jew, and was circumciſed at Hamburg: that after this he turned Papiſt, then Calviniſt, and laſtly Lutheran; that he was created extraordinary Profeſſor, (contrary to the uſual cuſtom) of the Hebrew tongue, in the Univerſity of Koninſberg, without having diſputed previouſly for it; that he was favoured by the Grand Marſhal on this occaſion; and that a quarrel breaking out between Latterman and Miſlenta, he ſided with the former.

* p. 69.

† In his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Pruſſia, p. 641. edit. 1686.

The Author of this letter makes, in the firſt place, a remark on the uncertainty which is found in theſe Writers, and on their variations, which are of ſuch a nature, that if ſome of them are not miſtaken, the reſt muſt neceſſarily tell a falſity. He afterwards takes notice of the extract of a letter, which a Senator of Dantzick wrote to him the 22d of April 1700. It is ſaid in this extract, that Hartknoch, ſpeaking no doubt of the ſame Nigrinus, whom he declares to have baptiſed Rittangelius, relates  that Nigrinus was a Lutheran, then a Calviniſt, and Preacher at Dantzick, and afterwards a Papiſt, at the ſolicitation of Valerius Magni the Capuchin, and that, before this happened, he had advanced ſeveral particulars, agreeably to the principles of the Socinians, concerning Chriſt's nativity. This Senator had been deſired to enquire, if there was any monument of this pretended baptiſm of Rittangelius, at Dantzick, by Nigrinus; and he was told, that this ceremony had been performed with pomp, and regiſtered in the moſt publick manner in the archives of the church, becauſe of the merit and erudition of the new Chriſtian. He anſwered, that Nigrinus was invited in 1630, to be Miniſter of the Proteſtant church (St. Peter's) in Dantzick; and that the office of baptiſing being appropriated, in that city, to the Deacons, excluſively of the Paſtors, it was not poſſible for Nigrinus to have baptiſed Rittangelius. He had not had time to enquire, whether he contributed to the converſion of this proſelyte. The Author of this letter concludes, from all theſe particulars, that Rittangelius had not been baptiſed or re-baptiſed in Dantzick, which proves, ſays he, that thoſe are miſtaken, who ſay that he was born a Jew, or turned ſuch. I am ſurprized, continues he, that ſo many famous Writers ſhould have neglected to enquire into the truth of this ſtory, which would not have been difficult for them to do in the life-time of Rittangelius, who had a great number of friends as well as enemies. But they contented themſelves with copying from one another, by publiſhing random reports, without taking the trouble to make any exact enquiry, whether it was well grounded or not.

 Ibid. p. 824.

He ſays, that living in Pruſſia in 1649, and the two following years, and having lodged for ſome months at Mr. Ahaſuerus Brand's, Great Marſhal, and one of the four Counſellors of the Regency, he had an opportunity of getting acquainted with Rittangelius the date of the dedication to one of his books (b).

(b) See the close of the rem. [A].

lius, and contracting a very intimate friendſhip with him. The Great Marſhal was his Patron, and uſed to invite him pretty often to dine with him. He, and ſeveral other perſons of honour and probity, told the Letter-writer, that Rittangelius was born a Roman-Catholick in the fortreſs of Frocheim in Franconia, in the dioceſe of Bamberg; that having ſtudied claſſical learning, he went to Conſtantinople, where he was very converſant with the Rabbins for twelve years; that at his return he turned Proteſtant, and went afterwards to Konigſberg, where the Elector of Brandenburg appointed him Profeſſor extraordinary of the Hebrew language; the Lutherans only being allowed to be ordinary Profeſſors in that Univerſity; that no perſon imagined him to be born a Jew, but that it nevertheleſs was ſuſpected he had been one.

The Letter-Writer relates, that one day, Baron d'Eulenburg, ſon-in-law to the Great Marſhal, bantered Rittangelius about circumciſion, at the table of his father-in-law, who was diſpleaſed with him for it. That Rittangelius, who was in the utmoſt confuſion, made a very modeſt excuſe on that occaſion; and complained, that he was very falſely ſuppoſed to have been circumciſed. The Letter-Writer, after dinner, expreſſed his ſorrow at his having been ſo groſsly affronted. Rittangelius, melting into tears, and venting the deepeſt ſighs, proteſted that he had never been circumciſed. The Letter-Writer affirms, that a Miniſter of Elbing, venerable for his probity and knowledge, gave him a good proof of this. This Miniſter had taken inexpreſſible pains to reſtore a good harmony in Rittangelius's family. This unhappy man was married to a woman who uſed him very ill (9), at the ſame time that ſhe was ſupported in her fantaſtical humours by her relations who lived in Elbing. The Miniſter in queſtion did all that lay in his power to calm theſe feuds; was witneſs to the wife's violent paſſion, and drew from thence a ſolid argument, in oppoſition to the common opinion of her huſband's having been circumciſed. He reaſoned thus: this woman, in her paſſion, uſed to throw out, in the moſt impudent manner, whatever ſhe thought could turn to her huſband's loſs and diſhonour, and yet ſhe never charged him with having been circumciſed, and conſequently he never was.

(9) The Letter-Writer informs me, that the cauſe of this woman's ill humour, was, becauſe Rittangelius, either by conſtitution, or by reaſon of his advanced age, was indued with the gift of continency more than his wife deſired.

The letter writer adds another reaſon. I do not find, ſays he, that any of Rittangelius's adverſaries reproached him with ſuch a thing, during his lifetime, in any book. Nevertheleſs ſeveral were wrote, and ſome of them with great rancour. He did not ſpare them, but attacked, very ſeverely, ſeveral famous writers; and particularly Miſſlenta (10), the pillar of Lutheraniſm in Konigſberg; and the Buxtorfes, whom he accuſed of being groſsly ignorant in Hebrew.

(10) Doctor of Divinity.

To conclude, the Letter-writer is of opinion, that the ſuſpicions were grounded on Rittangelius's having frequented none but Jews during his abode in Conſtantinople, and becauſe he had quite the air and manner of a Rabbin. But theſe are no proofs of his having certainly embraced the Jewiſh faith. He poſſibly might have flattered the Jews, that he would go over to them, in order to prompt them to inſtruct him in the moſt refined and abſtruſe parts of their learning, and afterwards might have withdrawn himſelf from them, and forfeited his promiſe (11).

(11) Extracted from a letter, ſcripta a Medico Germano T L. K. ad Medicum Hollandicum P. B.

ROBERT (JOHN), Profeſſor of the Civil Law in the Univerſity of Orleans, the place of his birth, in the 16th Century, gained reputation by his works [A]. ANNE (a) ROBERT, his ſon, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, publiſhed ſome law-books which are eſteemed [B]. See the letter which Paſquier wrote to him (b). Lewis Robert, his ſon, Advocate in the ſame Parliament, died very young, and had gained great reputation

(a) And not Andrew, as Konig ſays.

(b) It is in book 19. p. 522 & ſeq. Tom. 2.

[A] He gained reputation by his works.] He publiſhed Sententiarum Juris libri IV, Paris 1557. Receptæ Juris civilis Lectiones libri II, Orleans 1567. Animadverſionum Juris civilis libri III, Paris 1580. Cujas, under the name of Mercator, wrote againſt this work; and Robert anſwered him and entitled his piece, Notarum libri III ad Jacobi Cujacii Mercatoris notarum libros III, at Orleans 1583. He alſo wrote a book againſt Robert Maſſon a Proteſtant Miniſter, which work, being tranſlated out of Latin into French, was printed at Paris in 1569. See du Verdier's Bibliotheque Françoiſe (1).

(1) p. 753.

[B] Anne Robert . . . . publiſhed ſome Law-books which are eſteemed.] His four books Rerum judicatarum are greatly eſteemed. Theſe are a collection either of arrets of the Parliament of Paris, or of the great Council &c. in remarkable caſes. The reaſons or arguments of the advocates are there deduced learnedly and at large; the whole being a perpetual ſeries of erudition and ſelect quotations. I would have made no farther mention of them, but that I call to mind that, among thoſe who declare that the paſſages of Tagereau, cited by me in the Article QUELLENEC, give offence, ſome of them go on the falſe ſuppoſition that this writer was of no weight; that he was univerſally unknown, and that no man but himſelf had preſumed to write in this manner. But I hope they will be no longer offended, if I ſhew them that this offence is grounded on an error with regard to a matter of fact; and this was one of the reaſons which prompted me to ſhew, in the ſecond edition of the Article QUELLENEC, I. that Tagereau's diſcourſe is not unknown (2): II. That another advocate of the Parliament of Paris (3) expreſſed himſelf as freely as he did. I add here in the ſame view, that is for the edification of the perſons ſo ſcandalized, that Anne Robert, one of the moſt famous advocates of that Parliament, has improved upon both of them; and that in a work dedicated to the great Achilles de Harlay, firſt Preſident of that auguſt Aſſembly. The Xth chapter of his IVth book Rerum judicatarum relates to a ſuit for impotency, brought, by way of appeal, to the Parliament of Paris. This Parliament confirmed by a decree (4) the ſentence of the eccleſiaſtical judges, who had commanded an inſpection to be made, and the Congreſs; which not being approved by the huſband, he had appealed to the Parliament. His advocate repreſented the abomination of ſuch a procedure; he did, in ſome meaſure, the ſame as happens in mighty revolutions of States, where, in order to give a very long duration, they are overturned for a little time (5). He diſpenſed with the laws of modeſty for the ſake of modeſty. He deſcribed in the moſt barefaced and impudent manner the ceremonies of the ſearch, in order to create an abhorrence to it; and to endeavour to extirpate a moſt impudent abuſe. Tagereau was animated by the ſame ſpirit; but as Robert did not write in a living language, he gave himſelf a much freer ſcope. Vultis ad perpetuam rei deteſtationem, quam à foro & judiciis explodi convenit, viſitationem (ſpectaculum odio publico dignum) verbis repræſentari? Parcite pudicæ aures, ſi quid in re obſcœna labatur verecundi ſermonis modeſtia. Puella reſupina jacet cruribus hinc inde diſtentis. Proſtant pudendæ corporis partes, quas natura ad delicias generis humani velavit. Has & matronæ (quæ obſtetrices anus ſunt) & medici inſpiciunt, pertractant, diducunt: Magiſtratus vultu compoſito riſum diſſimulat: Matronæ præſentes venerem dudum oblitam refricant: Medici pro ætatis diſcrimine, hic vires priſtinas reminiſcitur, ille animo æſtuante inanis ludicri ſpectaculo paſcitur: Chirurgus aut ferramento fabrefacto (id ſpeculum matricis vocari ſolet) aut cereo & fictitio Priapo aditus Venereos tentat, aperit, reſerat: Puella jacens titillatione veſana prurit: Ut etiam ſi virgo viſitari cœperit, inde tamen non incor-

(2) It was inſerted in the Bibli. du Droit Franc. a work reprinted at Paris in 1667.

(3) Sebaſtian Roulliard.

(4) The 20th of January 1587.

(5) An old Roman uſed to ſay, Leges ſemper ut eſſent, aliquando non fuerunt.

tation. See James Gutherius's Choartius major, vel de orbitate toleranda. This treatiſe is annexed to the book De Jure Manium: it is addreſſed by the Author to Anne Robert, whom he comforts to the beſt of his power. I have ſpoken before (c) of PETER ROBERT, one of the moſt illuſtrious Advocates of the Parliament of Paris in the reign of Henry II. and ſhall alſo ſpeak of him hereunder [C]. I know not whether the Orleans Profeſſor and he were of the ſame family.

(c) Citat. (10) of the art. MARILLAC (Charles de).

His ſon Anne had a daughter named Anne, who was married to a brother of Andrew du Laurens the Phyſician (d). His family is ſtill in being, and makes a conſpicuous figure in Paris. Mr. Robert, the King's Attorney at the Chatelet, deſcends from it. He has a ſon who is Preſident in the Chamber of Accompts; and a brother, Grand Vicar of the Dioceſe of Niſmes; and another brother who, quitting the Intendancy of Canada, was appointed Intendant of the Navy at Breſt in January 1703. The late Mr. Robert, Canon and great Penitentiary of Notre Dame at Paris, was their brother (e).

(d) See rem. [E] of the art. LAURENS (Andrew du).

(e) From the Mercure Galant, for Jan. 1703, p. 271.

[" Robert (John) died at Nevers in 1590, leaving eleven children. He was " Counſellor in the Preſidial at Orleans, and ſon of James Robert, who alſo was Counſellor and Profeſſor of Law in the ſame city. With regard to Anne Robert, he was " living in 1617, and died of the gout very ſoon after, his epitaph being inſerted in the " Feriæ Forenſes, a work of Anthony Mornai's, printed in 1619. Lewis Robert, his " ſon, who alſo was an Advocate of reputation, died very young in 1613. James Gu- " therius, mentioned above by Bayle, was called in French Goutiere, and there is an arti- " cle of him in Moreri, under the word Guthieres *".]

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayles's Dict. vol. 4. p. 982. col. 2.

ROBERVAL,

rupta recedat (6). Modeſty, continues he, will not ſuffer me to proceed farther (7). He afterwards obſerves, that notwithſtanding the immodeſty of this cuſtom, it might be tolerated, if it was a certain way of diſcovering the proofs that are ſought for; but he affirms that theſe are altogether inſidious, and thereupon he introduces a vaſt deal of obſcenity. The whole chapter is filled with ſuch thoughts and expreſſions; and nothing can be more laſcivious than that part where the wife's advocate challenges the poor huſband to the combat; and deſcribes to him the ſweets that may be found in the field of battle. [" Bayle does not give a proper account of the ſequel " of this proceſs. The eccleſiaſtical judge had or- " dered the ſearch only to be made, and it was from " this ſentence that the huſband appealed. The two " advocates, Bernard for the huſband, and Garnier " for the wife, (who was but eighteen) who ſued for " a divorce, ſpoke a great deal for their reſpective " clients; the one juſtifying and the other condemn- " ing viſitationem & congreſſum. The Court, by a " decree of the 20th of January 1587, transferred " the parties to the eccleſiaſtical judge, to have the " firſt ſentence executed *."] There had been ſuch another cauſe in the Parliament of Paris ſome years before. I obſerve this, only to have occaſion of ſaying, that Anthony Hotman, brother to the famous Francis Hotman, declared againſt the Congreſs, and that he was extremely free in his expreſſions (8). The book publiſhed by him on this ſubject, is entitled, Traitté de la diſſolution du mariage par froideur de l'homme ou de la femme. i. e. " A Treatiſe concerning " the diſſolution of marriage, by the frigidity of the " huſband or wife." It has been ſeveral times reprinted. I believe that the firſt edition was that of 1581 (9); and that this year one of his relations was ſued, upon pretence of impotency, in order to get the marriage diſſolved. It is certain Rouillard (10) ſaid, that Anthony Hotman drew up this treatiſe, only to promote the divorce of one of his relations. The reader will pleaſe to obſerve, that this Francis Hotman's brother made a conſpicuous figure among the advocates, and was appointed Attorney General in the parliament of Paris by the leaguers. I therefore would not have any perſon imagine, that Tagereau is the only perſon I could have alledged on this occaſion. I would have it remembered, that the greateſt perſons at the bar might have been mentioned. I muſt not omit that a certain advocate (11) tranſlated and publiſhed a French tranſlation of Anne Robert's work. I have not got that verſion; but I fancy that the Latin paſſage quoted above, and many others, are not ſo natural, or rather ſo naked, as the original; and yet they are very obſcene.

(6) Annæus Robertus, Rerum judicatarum, lib. 4. cap. 10. p. 730. Geneva edit. 1620, 8vo.

(7) Plura dicere vetat pudor. Idem, ibid.

* From the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. vol. 4. p. 982. col. 2.

(8) See the rem. [H] of the art. QUELLENEC.

(9) See du Verdier, Bibl. Franc. p. 891.

(10) In the capitulary quoted above, at the beginning of the rem. [F], of the art. QUELLENEC.

I have read in Beza's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, that the wife of an advocate at whoſe houſe, in Paris, the Proteſtants had aſſembled ſeveral times, ſurrendered herſelf priſoner to the Chatelet, with her two daughters, to convince the world of the falſity of the reports which had been ſpread, viz. that thoſe aſſemblies were unchaſte (12). " The Court . . . . " cauſed the young women to be ſearched ſeveral " times by many ſurgeons and midwives. But all the " ſearchers, one old matron excepted, judged them " to be virgins: nor did ſhe herſelf dare to affirm " poſitively that they had been vitiated by men; " and at laſt, ſhe begged their pardon, after they " were ſet at liberty; and declared how, and in " what manner, ſhe had been ſuborned (13)." Beza does not ſeem to condemn the trial to which they ſubmitted; and, to ſay the truth, there were ſuch circumſtances in this affair, as might excuſe them for ſubmitting to be ſearched, notwithſtanding the dictates of modeſty, and the danger they ran, becauſe the ſearchers might be ſuſpected of unfair dealing. I ſhall ſay nothing of the uncertainty of this kind of procedure; but will obſerve, that had theſe young women refuſed to be ſearched, they would have confirmed the depoſitions of the falſe witneſſes. The buſineſs was, to confute the informations, which preſident St. André had cauſed to be drawn up, in which two witneſſes affirmed, that in the Aſſembly on Holy Thurſday, conſiſting of a great number of men, women and girls, about midnight . . . . after their ſermon was over, and a great noiſe was made, and they had eat a pig inſtead of the Paſcal lamb; and put out the lamb which had lighted them, each male coupled with his female; and that he diſcovered, among other men's wives, that of the ſaid advocate, and her two young, beautiful daughters, one of whom coming in the way of one of theſe deponents, he enjoyed her two or three times (14). Theſe informations made great noiſe, and were ſhewed to the Queen-mother (15).

(11) One Tournet. I was informed of this by Mr. Marais, (mentioned citation 88, of the art. HENRY III. and elſewhere) with ſome other particulars.

(12) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſ. des Egliſes, liv. 3. p. 238. ad ann. 1560.

(13) Ibid.

(14) Extracted from Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſ. liv. 3. p. 235.

(15) Ibid.

[C] I ſhall alſo ſpeak of him hereunder.] This Peter Robert was a native of Paris (16): See what is ſaid about him in the decalogue concerning the advocates of Parliament. " He had gained greater eſteem " than the abovementioned; not that I believe he " was more learned than they, I rather thinking that " he did not know ſo much; but his perſon, voice " and action were graceful; and was more valued " for his natural parts than for his erudition. He " acquired his fame chiefly by two pleadings; the " firſt was that he made in favour of Preſident Oppede, with regard to Cabrieres and Merindol, the " hiſtory of which is ſo well written by Thuanus, " that I need not make farther mention of it to you. " The late Mr. Clement du Puy had been firſt entruſted with that cauſe; but being afterwards afflicted with the ſickneſs of which he died, Preſident Oppede applied himſelf to Robert, whom he " every day informed of the things he was to ſay. " The other cauſe of Robert's advancement was, that " turning Proteſtant, he was employed by the late " Prince of Conde, grandfather to the Prince, to " ſhew his innocence. Since this time he was always employed by the Proteſtants, which coſt him " his life, he falling a victim in the maſſacre on St. " Bartholomew's day (17)."

(16) Loiſel, Dialogue des Avocats, p. 517, 556.

(17) Ibid. p. 519.

[A] The

ROBERVAL, Profeſſor of the Mathematicks at Paris, contemporary with Des Cartes, and his great enemy. See the Sorberiana, and Baillet (a). [" His name was " Gilles Perſonne, Sieur de Roberval. See Moreri under the article PERSONNE *".] * From the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. vol. 4. p. 982. col. 2.

(a) Baillet, Vie Des Cartes, Tom. 1. p. 304, where he ſays that there are two errors in the laſt volume of Moreri. See alſo his Traite des Auteurs deguiſez, part. 2. chap. 6.

ROCABERTI (JOHN THOMAS DE), Archbiſhop of Valentia, in the 17th Century, was one of the ornaments of the Dominican Order. He was Profeſſor of Divinity in Valentia, provincial of the Dominicans in the Province of Arragon; afterwards General of the Order; twice Viceroy of Valentia, and laſtly Inquiſitor General of Spain. He employed his utmoſt endeavours to maintain the Pope's authority; and not contented with having written ſeveral volumes on this ſubject, in oppoſition to the deciſions of the Clergy of France, he employed both his labour and money to collect, in one body, the ſeveral treatiſes which others have employed on the ſame ſubject. This collection printed at Rome, and entitled, Bibliotheca maxima Pontificia, contains twenty volumes in folio. Rocaberti died the 13th of January 1699, aged ſeventy four years.

ROCCO (GIRALOMO), was ſo great a maſter of the art of fine writing, that it is juſt to take notice of him. He was born in Venice, and lived in the beginning of the 17th Century. The reader will ſee hereunder the teſtimonies which the Duke of Savoy gave him of his favour [A].

[A] The teſtimonies which the Duke of Savoy gave him of his eſteem.] I met with the following particulars, in a book entitled, La ſage & delectable folie, written by J. Marcel. " I ſhould employ a great " deal of writing, ſhould I enumerate all the Mo- " narchs, who have indulged their favour and libera- " lity to the virtuoſi; I ſhall only content myſelf " with obſerving what I myſelf ſaw in the perſon " of the Sieur Rocco Girolami of Venice, a very " good accomptant, and ſo beautiful a writer, that I " am of opinion none of his contemporaries exceeded " him in that particular. He dedicated a book en- " graved on copper plates, to his Highneſs of Sa- " voy, in 1603, adorned with various ſorts of letters, " cyphers, and very fine flouriſhes or ſtriking; which " this great Prince ſeeing, he, to reward the Author's " genius and induſtry, put, with his own hand, a " gold chain about his neck, valued at 126 crowns " (1)." The Author ſpeaks of the ſame recompence, in another part of his book, I mean the chapter on la folie des eſcrivains (the folly of writing-maſters) (2). The reader will perhaps not be diſpleaſed to meet there with the names of ſome perſons, who, he affirms, excelled in this art. " We have " had, ſays he (3), a great number of fine writers, " who have publiſhed books of various ſorts of " hands, as, in France, le Gagneur, Lucas, Joſſerand, " and others: in Italy, D. Auguſtin of Sienna, M. " Martin de Romagna, Camillo Buonadio of Pia- " cenza, Creſci of Milan, Curio of Rome, Pala- " tin, Verrue, and others, with Sieur M. Antonio of " Genoa, who, in 1606, compoſed a book of vari- " ous letters and characters, dedicated to the Prince " of Mantua and Montferrat."

See La Croix du Maine, Bibliotheque Francoiſe, pag. 424, 425.

(1) Marcel, Sage & delectable folie, liv. 1. p. 106. It appears by the approbation of the Doctors, and the King's licence, that this work was printed in 1628. I make uſe of the Lyons edit. of 1650, in 8vo.

(2) The 6th of book 2.

(3) Ibid. lib. 2. p. 80.

ROCHEFOUCAUD (ALEXANDER DE LA), Abbot of St. Martin (a), brother to that Count of Randan killed at the battle of Iſſoire, and to Francis Biſhop of Clermont, who was afterwards Cardinal, joined very unluckily in the impoſture of Martha Broſſier, who pretended to be poſſeſſed with the Devil. I obſerved in the article of this Martha, that at laſt the Parliament of Paris having cauſed her to be conveyed to Romarantin by the Provoſt, commanded her father not to permit her to leave that place, without the expreſs permiſſion of the Judge. But the father and his daughter, notwithſtanding this prohibition, went with our Abbot to Auvergne, and afterwards to Avignon. Though the Parliament of Paris ſummoned this Abbot twice to appear; and at the laſt, the revenues of his benefices were ſeized for his contempt of the Court (b); this crew proceeded nevertheleſs in their journey, and went to Rome, imagining that this woman, who was ſuppoſed to be poſſeſſed with the Devil, would play her part better on that great ſtage, and would meet with more credulity in a place which is the ſource of belief (c). The Biſhop of Clermont was ſo ſtrongly ſuſpected of having ſuggeſted to his brother this ſilly deſign, that he alſo was ſentenced to forfeit his eccleſiaſtical revenues (d). Henry V. being well informed of the wicked deſigns, which were hatching under this cover, ordered Mr. de Silleri his Embaſſador, and Cardinal d'Oſſat, to diſcover the plot; and to prepoſſeſs the Pope before this company of players could act their farce. They executed this order with care; beſides, Cardinal d'Oſſat won over the Jeſuits [A], ſo that the Abbot of St. Martin, upon his arrival into Rome, found himſelf abandoned by the principal aſſiſtance on which he had depended. The Jeſuits abandoned him; and the Pope, who was forewarned, did nothing in oppoſition to the decree of the Parliament, pronounced againſt the pretended demoniac. The Abbot was obliged to addreſs in moſt humble ſupplications, both for himſelf and his brother, King Henry IV. He fell ſick a little after, and died for grief, as it was reported, to have undertaken ſo long a journey, only to be laughed at. Martha and her father, being abandoned by every one, were forced to go to an hoſpital, as their laſt aſylum (e).

(a) Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. ad ann. 1599. p. m. 205, 206.

(b) Thuan. lib. 133. circa init.

(c) Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. ad ann. 1599. p. 206.

(d) Thuan. lib. 123. circa init.

(e) Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. ad ann. 1599. p. 206. Thuanus ſpeaks as follows of this. Ita fabula de Martha à Spiritu obſeſſa omnino evanuit, ipſo Sanmartino qui ſpe ſua falſus in aula illa deſpectus eſſe cœperat, ex mœrore mox mortuo, & Martha patreque ejus ex xenodochiorum ſtipe miſeram vitam vix tolerantibus.

RODON

[A] Cardinal d'Oſſat won over the Jeſuits.] He ſpoke privately to father Sirmond, their General's (1) Secretary; and after ſhewing him the King's orders, he obſerved to him, that there was juſt cauſe to fear that this Abbot's attempt would be an obſtacle with regard to the recalling of the Jeſuits, becauſe both he and the Biſhop of Clermont had ſtudied among them. He afterwards repreſented to him the raſhneſs of ſuch an attempt; and how prejudicial it would be to the Church, ſhould the ſupreme Courts of the kingdom quarrel again with the Pope, which arguments had a very good effect.

(1) His name was Aquaviva.

RODON (DAVID DE) or rather DERODON (DAVID), Profeſſor of Philoſophy, firſt at Die, afterwards at Orange, and laſtly at Nîmes, was born in Dauphiné. He was one of the moſt acute Logicians at that time in France; and few Spaniſh or Iriſh ſchoolmen exceeded him in what concerns Univerſals, and Entia rationum, and the airy and abſtracted ſpeculations of categories, and the dependencies of the ſyllogiſtical forms. But if he equalled, in this particular, the Logicians of the moſt refined ſchools, he ſurpaſſed them greatly in phyſicks; he embracing the opinions of the moderns, and the hypotheſis of atoms; for he explains, like Gaſſendus, ſeveral natural effects by mechanical principles. His body of philoſophy ſold very well; the bookſeller gained very conſiderably by it, and particularly by the abridgment of it; the former diſheartening the reader, by the too great length of the ſcholiaſtic diſputes. Derodon wrote a book De Suppoſito, wherein he declared publickly for Neſtorius, in oppoſition to St. Cyril; not by admitting two perſons, but by aſſerting that Neſtorius did not admit them; and that St. Cyril confounded the two natures of Chriſt. Herein he did but follow the footſteps of a Gentleman of Provence [A], with whom he doubtleſs had been acquainted; and who forſook the Church of Rome and turned a very zealous Proteſtant. This opinion of the Sieur Derodon is an incident or epiſode of the famous diſpute that aroſe between two Proteſtant Divines in Holland [B], and which is not yet ended (a). I ſhall take ſome notice

(a) I wrote this in 1696, when I was about the firſt edition of this work. But I muſt now obſerve, that this diſpute was ended ſoon after.

[A] Herein he did but follow the footſteps of a Gentleman of Provence.] This was Giles Gaillard. He turned Proteſtant about the year 1630, and retired to Orange, where he wrote a panegyric on Prince Frederic Henry. He did not omit the motives of his converſion. See the book he entitled, Le Proſelyte Evangelique. Here follows what we find concerning his book De Suppoſito, in a letter which Sorbiere wrote to Voſſius in 1646, in ſending him the copy which the Author had given him. Illi (Ægidio Gaillardo nobili Gallo) nuper venit in mentem neſcio quid circa Neſtorium, quaſi perperam in Epheſina Synodo fuerit livore Cyrilli hæreſeos inſimulatus damnatuſque; eaque de re edidit librum, cui titulus eſt De Suppoſito (1). i. e. "It is "Giles Gaillard, a French Gentleman, who entertained "not long ſince an odd notion with regard to Neſto"rius; as though he, by the ſpite of Cyril, had "been unjuſtly charged with hereſy, and condemned "in the Council of Epheſus. This Gentleman pub"liſhed a book, entitled, De Suppoſito, on that ſub"ject." The poſtſcript to this letter is remarkable; it thereby appearing, that one of the moſt learned Miniſters held the ſame opinion (2).

(1) See the 432d of the letters writ to Voſſius, p. 285.

(2) Audio Job. Croium in eadem eſſe ſententia in qua Gaillardus noſter.

[B] The opinion of the Sieur Derodon, is an incident or epiſode of the famous diſpute that aroſe between two Proteſtant Divines in Holland.] This will appear from the following long paſſage, extracted from Mr. Saurin, one of the two diſputants. "This Mr. Jurieu is a "wonderful man! Errors are all purified by paſſing "through his channel; and what is hereſy in others, "is orthodoxy in him, by virtue of his impetuous "and over-bearing zeal. In his firſt apology, pub"liſhed by him after the Synod of Leyden, he gives "the hiſtory of the birth and progreſs of that per"nicious cabal of Socinian (or having a tendency "that way) hereticks: perſons to whom all religions "are equally indifferent, and half Atheiſts, among "whom he ranks all thoſe whom he would make "the object of the publick hatred. He relates ſeveral "particulars concerning that cabal, to have a plau"ſible opportunity of giving the catalogue of his "virtues, and heroic acts. Among the characteriſ"ticks of hereſy, which he diſcovers among ſome "Divines, he includes the approbation they gave to "the late Mr. Derodon's book, entitled, De Suppo"ſito, which he calls twice, in the ſpace of half a "page, the wicked book De Suppoſito: he obſerves "that this wicked book was burnt in Toulouſe; a "mighty proof of the wickedneſs of a book. I "own that the Author was ſuſpected to have com"mitted ſome errors; but probably theſe ſuſpicions "were owing to his having departed from the re"ceived opinion; and perhaps, by his extending his "philoſophical liberty a little too far. He was "brought into trouble, more than once, by his doc"trine, but came off with honour. I ſaw him in "1664 at Geneva, whither he had fled, after his be"ing baniſhed from France, for writing a book, "entitled, Le Tombeau de la Meſſe. I had frequent "converſations with him on various ſubjects, and he "always appeared perfectly orthodox to me. He "died at Geneva the ſame year 1664, to the beſt "of my memory, a little after I left that place and "went for Holland. I was informed that he made "a very pious end, and that the confeſſion he made "of his faith gave great ſatisfaction. But whatever "may be the ſecret opinions of this philoſopher, and "the words he may have ſpoke in converſation, or "writ in other books, the treatiſe De Suppoſito ought "not to anſwer for them, he being anſwerable only "for the errors contained in them. When a man "is ſuſpected, people ought to guard themſelves a"gainſt them, and ſift all his words, ne lateat an"guis in herba, for fear a ſnake ſhould be lurking "in the graſs. But then his orthodox opinions muſt "not be changed into errors, nor all his errors into "hereſies. The deſign of this reflection is not en"tirely to juſtify the treatiſe de Suppoſito, but to apo"logize for it in the mind of a man, who himſelf "ſtands in need of being pardoned and excuſed. "One can hardly conjecture what Mr. Jurieu diſap"proves in this book, unleſs it be the ſame liberty "of anſwering the title of mother of God, aſcribed "to the bleſſed Virgin, which he himſelf takes in "one of his paſtoral letters. The Philoſopher in "queſtion explains the word Suppoſitum in a manner "altogether orthodox, both with regard to the hu"man and divine perſons. In his explication of the "perſon of Chriſt, after his incarnation, he made "choice of an opinion which was moſt generally re"ceived, and leaſt expoſed to ill conſequences and "the cavil of the hereticks. He indeed declares for "Neſtorius againſt Cyril, and againſt the fathers of "the Council of Epheſus, whoſe hereſy he ſuppoſes "Eutyches imbibed. But if this is an error, it is "only with regard to matter of fact, and a book "ſhould not be conſidered as deteſtable upon that ac"count. Where then is the poiſon of that ill fated "book? It is only in the averſion, which the Author "ſhews againſt the title of Θεοτόκος, mother of God; "and the ill humour he diſcovers againſt Cyril, and "the Divines of his party, whom he conſiders as "the Patriarchs of idolatry (3). The cenſurer of "this Philoſopher is not ſo ſevere againſt their per"ſons; but then he entertains the ſame opinions as "he did with reſpect to their doctrine. He ſpares "theſe, who have introduced the term in queſtion "into the Church, but he has no mercy upon the "term itſelf. His opinion is, that Cyril himſelf "was not an idolater; all his fault being, according "to him, a miſtaken zeal. But this fatal word "Θεοτόκος was the foundation of idolatry and even "the occaſion of the Neſtorian hereſy. I will once "more ſet down the expreſs words of our zealous "defender of orthodoxy, and particularly of the "Anti-Neſtorian orthodoxy (4)."

(3) See the rem. [M] of the art. NESTORIUS, whether the expreſſion, mother of God, is the figure and foundation of the worſhip of the bleſſed virgin.

(4) Saurin, Examen de la Theologie de Mr. Jurieu, p. 867 & ſeq.

Here the Author preſents us with a long extract of his adverſary's paſtoral letters, in which the title of mother of God is condemned, as the ſource of idolatry, and then proceeds thus (5). "The Author of the work "entitled, De Suppoſito, has not ſaid any thing, in "the main, ſtronger than this: for if Mr. Jurieu "pretends,

(5) Ibid. p. 870.

notice of this in the remarks; and will not omit the ſpecious accuſations brought againſt this Philoſopher, as being extremely ignorant in matters relating to eccleſiaſtical hiſtory [C]. He engaged in controverſy, and exaſperated his adverſaries to ſuch a degree, that they

" pretends, that this Philoſopher has abſolutely re-
" fuſed the bleſſed Virgin the glorious title of mother
" of God, it will be ſaid that he did it in the ſame
" ſenſe as Mr. Jurieu does it himſelf. The contrary
" cannot be proved by his book. And ſince this " Author acknowledges in Chriſt a ſingle perſon as " well as two natures; and that according to the " principles of his philoſophy, actiones & paſſiones
" ſunt ſuppoſitorum, which maxim he very often re-
" peats; we have reaſon to believe that he did not " deny that the bleſſed Virgin was the mother of " him who is God, of him who is a divine per-" ſon. And indeed he gives her the title of mother
" of Chriſt, after having acknowledged that Chriſt
" is a ſole perſon, God and man together; and even
" a divine perſon, whoſe perſonality reſides properly
" in the Word. What mighty difference is there
" then between the delicacy of this Philoſopher, and " that of our Divine? Why is the former a heretic
" and the latter orthodox, ſince they both think and
" ſay the ſame thing on the ſame ſubject? . . . .
" With regard to myſelf, I have publickly declared
" againſt the delicacy both of the Divine and the " Philoſopher. I perſiſt in this aſſertion; I diſap-
" prove their boldneſs, and the ſingularity of their " opinions; I condemn their miſtakes and errors; I
" blame both, but I do not pronounce an anathema
" againſt either of them. . . . . I have ſometimes ad-
" mired the zeal of Mr. Derodon, a zealous Pro-
" teſtant, Anti-Papiſt, and Anti-Idolater. He con-
" ſiders all the Miniſters of the Proteſtant Church as " Angels of Laodicea, and lukewarm Miniſters;
" becauſe we will not excommunicate Cyril and the " Fathers of the Council of Epheſus, ſuch a zeal is " pretty extraordinary in a Philoſopher; but Mr.
" Jurieu is too indulgent, in pardoning Cyril and " the Fathers of the Council of Epheſus, for having " introduced idolatry. Mr. Derodon's ſyſtem is more
" conſiſtent than that of Mr. Jurieu. Mr. Derodon
" ranks Cyril and the Fathers of the Council of " Epheſus among the idolaters, whoſe parents they " are. Mr. Jurieu would ſeparate parents from
" the children, after having accuſed the former of " being the cauſe of the crime of the latter. The " only difference between Mr. Derodon and Mr. Ju" rieu, is, that, according to Mr. Derodon, Cyril,
" and the Fathers of the Council of Epheſus, acted
" and reaſoned conſequentially; they were idolaters,
" and eſtabliſhed idolatry; and that, according to Mr.
" Jurieu, theſe Fathers, who formed a general Coun" cil, have eſtabliſhed the greateſt of all idolatries,
" and at the ſame time were not idolaters themſelves."

Mr. Jurieu's reply is very long, and conſiſts of many pieces; of which I will extract only ſuch as relate to Derodon (6). " De Rodon's book de Suppoſito
" is ſcarce, and I had not ſeen it when I publiſhed
" a very ſmall pamphlet, entitled Idée des ſentimens de
" Mr. Saurin, (a tranſient view of Mr. Saurin's ſen" timents;) and therefore whatever I ſaid about it in " that little work, ought to paſs for nothing. Since " that time, an illuſtrious friend put De Rodon's book
" into my hands. After examining it, I did not find " any expreſs hereſy in it, but an unaccountable raſh-
" neſs, a furious deſire to bring an odium upon Cy" ril, and to blacken the Council of Epheſus. I did " not find him faithful in his citations; leſs ſo in his " interpretations, and his proofs entirely ſophiſtical.
" I therefore think this work worthy of being ſen-
" tenced to the flames, as it was by the Parliament
" of Toulouſe: for the endeavouring to make thoſe
" paſs for Hereticks who defended the holy myſte-
" ries, is the infallible way to bring them into con-
" tempt. The Author was one of thoſe Latitudina-
" rians, who appeared about forty years ago in the " ſouthern provinces; and whom Petit, Profeſſor of " Divinity at Niſmes, ſeems to have favoured. This
" at leaſt appears by the extracts which the Sieur
" d'Huiſſeau, a great Latitudinarian, gave of them,
" in juſtification of his book de la Reunion de Chriſti-
" aniſme (for the union of Chriſtians) De Rodon, in " order to promote the common intereſt of the ſect
" of which he is a member, does all that lyes in his " power to make the ancients odious and contempti-
" ble . . . (7). De Rodon, the greateſt, and per" haps the firſt enemy, among the moderns (8), of " St. Cyril, was a trifling ſophiſt, unſkilled in anti" quity. He was a Profeſſor in Philoſophy, and " prided himſelf very much in his ſubtlety. Now
" the learned and the wiſe know what a ſubtle man
" is, who is ſubtle in the peripatetic way. Such a " one is a ſophiſt, and ſuch a one was Rodon. He " attempted to diſtinguiſh and immortalize himſelf
" by declaring war againſt Cyril and the Council of " Epheſus. And his book is written purpoſely to " ſhew that he was an Eutychian, that is, to have " confounded the two natures, and to have compoſed
" a ſingle one out of the two; and to prove, on the " contrary, that Neſtorius was very orthodox. The " work in queſtion is greatly cried up by our Latitu-
" dinarians. I firſt ſaw it in Mr. Pajon's hands, and
" he applauded it to me as an excellent work; and
" Mr. Saurin has often beſtowed no leſs encomiums
" on it in my preſence. A judgment highly worthy
" of two perſons who are totally ignorant in matters
" of antiquity. Rodon is of the ſame character. He " concerned himſelf in an affair he did not under" ſtand. He had either borrowed or ſtole all he ſays
" againſt St. Cyril, from a friend whom he often
" mentions, and who (he ſays) had drawn up a " complete hiſtory of the diſputes between Cyril and
" Neſtorius, a circumſtance he does not conceal . . . .
" He was not only ignorant but malicious; for no" thing can ſhew more malice or inſincerity than this
" man's diſpute againſt Cyril (9)."

I ſhall not make any reflections on what the reader has here ſeen; for in all probability Mr. Saurin's anſwer will be printed before I ſhall have finiſhed this work; and it is in this anſwer (10) that the reader may ſee the raſh judgments, and other faults of Mr. Jurieu. I only ſay, that it is no ways probable that Derodon intended to favour the pretended Latitudinarian faction; he defending Neſtorius not by conſidering him as the defender of the moral union of the word with the human nature (11), but by conſidering him as orthodox with regard to the hypoſtatic union; and he abuſes Cyril, only becauſe he conſiders him as the Author of the Eutychian confuſion of the two natures. Doubtleſs his only view was to vex the Papiſts; and to make them aſhamed of their oppreſſing the memory of innocent men, at the ſame time that they raiſe to the ſkies a heretic, who was aſſiſted by the ſecular power, had the Emperor's favour, and the predominant faction of a Council. If we would extend our charity a little, it might be affirmed that his only view was to ſuccour innocence, by ſhewing that Neſtorius is unjuſtly conſidered as a heretic. A man who exclaims againſt St. Cyril, cannot be ſaid to be neceſſarily prompted by a ſpirit of malice. Perhaps no party leader ever deſerved leſs to be uſed with tenderneſs. He behaved with ſo much violence and fury, that he does not deſerve thanks for maintaining the truth, in caſe he did maintain it; if he found it, it was merely by chance. A mettleſome horſe, who runs away with the bit in his teeth, that eſcapes breaking his head againſt the walls of a ſtable, becauſe his impetuoſity hurried him towards a door that was half open, is the image of certain Doctors who hit upon orthodoxy, in ſpite of an hundred impetuous paſſions that fire them, and make them infringe all rules. All the common places alledged by Mr. Jurieu to juſtify St. Cyril and condemn Neſtorius, may ſerve to juſtify the latter and condemn the former. A ſpecimen of this might eaſily be given.

[C] The ſpecious accuſations brought againſt this Philoſopher, as being extremely ignorant in matters relating to eccleſiaſtical hiſtory.] " He very probably had " never ſeen the acts of the Council of Epheſus,
" which indeed is ſufficiently evident from the bare
" title of his book. Diſputatio de ſuppoſito; in quâ
plurima

(6) Jurieu, Religion du Latitudinaire, p. 270.

(7) Ibid. p. 278.

(8) Had Mr. Jurieu known what relates to Giles Gaillard, (See the rem. [A]) he would not have ſpoke thus.

(9) Jurieu, Religion du Latitudinaire, p. 281, 282.

(10) It was publiſhed in 1697, and entitled, Juſtification de la Doctrine du Sieur Saurin . . . contre deux Libelles de Mr. Jurieu l'un intitule Idée des Sentimens, &c. & l'autre la Religion du Latitudinaire. See chap. 13. p. 342 & ſeq.

(11) It is to be obſerved, Mr. Jurieu declares, P. 277, that the reaſon of the hatred of the Latitudinarians againſt St. Cyril, was owing to his cauſing to be condemned the moral union of the word, which is their idol.

they obtained a decree from the King, whereby he was baniſhed the Kingdom in 1663 (b). He withdrew to Geneva, and died there two years after, or thereabouts. Thoſe of his party were not always ſatisfied with his doctrine, and he was brought into trouble on that account, but he extricated himſelf with honour (c). I cannot ſay whether the ſynods or conſiſtories were offended at his denying, that the preſervation of the creatures was a perpetual creation [D].

(b) It was for his having publiſhed a book, entitled, Tombeau de la Meſſe. See l'Hiſtoire de l'Edit de Nantes, Tom. 3. p. 563. He had publiſhed a diſpute concerning the Euchariſt, at Geneva, in 1655, 8vo.

(c) See the rem. [B].

He had been a Roman Catholick, on which account Theophilus Raynaud calls him a deſerter of the faith; it being he whom he hints at in the paſſage I quote from his Hoplotheca [E].

ROHAN

" plurima hactenus inaudita de Neſtorio tanquam Ortho-
" doxo, & de Cyrillo Alexandrino, aliiſque Epiſcopis in
" Synodum Epheſi coactis tanquam hæreticis; and page
" 71 of his book are the following words: Rem no-
" vam & hactenus inauditam jam demonſtrandam ſuſ-
" cipimus, &c. ſcilicet Cyrillum Alexandrinum & alios
" Epiſcopos qui tertio Concilio Oecumenico interfuerunt
" fuiſſe hæreticos, & Authores hæreſis Eutychianæ.
" What a prodigious boldneſs and ignorance do we " ſee here! If this man had but juſt looked into " the Authors of the fifth century, and particularly
" into the acts of the Council of Epheſus, could he
" ſay that the accuſation brought againſt Cyril, as " being the Author of the Eutychian hereſy which " confounds the two natures, was unheard of? He " was accuſed of this by all the Neſtorians, and by a " great number of Authors who were not ſo; by
" John Biſhop of Antioch, by whom Cyril was ex-
" communicated as confounding the two natures,
" and aſcribing to the divine nature of Chriſt all
" the infirmities, which are relative only to his hu-
" man nature (12)." The Author exhibits many more ſuch proofs, which ſhew that St. Cyril was charged with this hereſy, and concludes as follows: To advance after this his accuſation againſt Cyril, as a mere diſcovery, and an unheard of thing, ſhews the moſt inſupportable folly, ignorance, and vanity. Several more ſuch proofs of Rodon's ignorance in that ſubject might be found (13).

(12) Jurieu, p. 279.

(13) Idem, ibid. p. 281.

Had I Derodon's book, I would give my opinion on this matter; but not having it by me, I ſhall only ſay, that the words, which his cenſurer cited from it, do not prove what he pretends. They declare that Derodon engaged himſelf to prove, as a thing unheard of, not that Cyril was accuſed of being the Author of Eutyches's errors; but that Cyril, and the reſt of the Fathers, who aſſiſted at the third general Council, were Hereticks, and gave riſe to Eutychianiſm. This weakens the proofs of what is alledged concerning this Philoſopher's ignorance (14), and ſhews that his Cenſurer either perverted, or did not know the ſtate of the queſtion. If it is a miſtake, we ought to excuſe it, conſidering the perplexity he muſt have been in, ſince he was to act as an Advocate for thoſe very perſons whom he had cenſured. Let the Reader figure to himſelf a man, who, to anſwer the Biſhop of Meaux, gave a moſt hideous picture of the primitive Fathers; and who, to anſwer Mr. Saurin, muſt make an elogium of thoſe very fathers: can ſuch an Author know what he ſays? How is it poſſible for a Writer to be maſter of his thoughts in ſuch a double abyſs? An Author, who is beat with his own weapons, and cannot make his defenſe but by refuting, and contradicting himſelf in the moſt pitiful manner; can ſuch an Author, I ſay, who bewilders himſelf in ſo ſtrange a manner, be anſwerable for a blunder? Neceſſity has no law; this is, what he may plead in his own favour: but then ſuch an apology does not juſtify the juſt complaints made by the publick, every Reader having a right to ſay, Whom do you take us for? Ought we to be ſo ſhamefully impoſed upon? when you are not able to anſwer an enemy, but by ſuppoſing that the Fathers are Hereticks, you charge them with hereſy; and becauſe, at the years end, you want to have him orthodox, in order to rid yourſelf of another enemy, you declare that their doctrine is ſound? Is not this a very unfair and ſhameful way of proceeding (15)?

(14) There is a wide difference between aſſerting that a whole Council is heretical, and aſſerting that a particular perſon was formerly accuſed of being an Heretick. The firſt aſſertion may be advanced as an unheard of thing, without ſuppoſing that the charge brought againſt a particular perſon, is a matter of fact unknown before.

(15) Compare this with the cloſe of the rem. [B], of the art. PETAVIUS.

Here follows what Saurin anſwered, with regard to Derodon's being reproached with ignorance. " Mr.
" Jurieu ſhews, that he has not looked into the treatiſe
" De Suppoſito, or that he hopes no one will look into
" it; for the Author collects a great number of " teſtimonies and hiſtorical incidents to ſupport his
" accuſation againſt Cyril and the Council of Ephe-
" ſus. He quotes Ibas, Biſhop of Edeſſa; Gennadius,
" Patriarch of Conſtantinople; Theodoret, Biſhop of
" Cyr; John, Archbiſhop of Antioch, and above
" forty eaſtern Biſhops, who charged Cyril as being " infected with Apollinaris's hereſy; and reproached
" him with making Chriſt's divine nature paſſible,
" by confounding it with his human nature. The " Author conſequently was not ignorant of this: and
" when he ſpeaks of Cyril's hereſy, and Neſtorius's
" orthodoxy, as an unheard of thing, he meant
" with reſpect to the two laſt ages, and not with re" gard to the age of Cyril and Neſtorius: and he " even conſiders, as an unheard of thing, not the " queſtion, which of theſe two Patriarchs was he" retick or orthodox; but the deciſion he gives with " reſpect to the queſtion, by juſtifying Neſtorius, and " condemning Cyril (16).

(16) Saurin, Juſtification de ſa Doctrine contre deux Libelles de Mr. Jurieu, p. 346.

[D] He denied that the preſervation of the creatures was a perpetual creation.] This was denying a doctrine, which, though very common among the Spaniſh and Iriſh ſchoolmen, is not the leſs evident on that account. We either muſt reject the moſt evident notions, or acknowledge that a Being formed out of nothing by the infinite power of a Creator, cannot have, within itſelf, any cauſe of its exiſtence. It conſequently cannot continue to exiſt but by the ſame power which produced it at firſt; it conſequently is created every moment of its duration; that is to ſay, that it exiſts every moment only, becauſe God continues to have the ſame will he had, when that Being firſt began to exiſt. This act of the divine will cannot ceaſe to create whilſt it ſubſiſts, ſince it did create at the firſt inſtant that the creature began to exiſt. Derodon's objections may be eaſily refuted, and are much the ſame with thoſe propoſed by Bernier (17). A Profeſſor of Philoſophy in the Academy of Puylaurent (18) wrote a treatiſe againſt Derodon on that ſubject, and refuted it ſolidly. That Philoſopher had had ſeveral conteſts with him in Niſmes; and I have been told that he was concerned in a book entitled, L'Impieté decouverte (Impiety diſplayed), written againſt Derodon. I have even been told that Mr. Claude, then Miniſter of Niſmes, lent his pen to the enemies of that Philoſopher, for the drawing up, or correcting of that work. How abſurd is it to ſay that God, according to Gaſſendi and David Derodon, contributes to the preſervation of creatures by preventing their deſtruction? Who ſhould deſtroy them, ſince there are but two ſorts of things in the univerſe, God and the creatures? Such an employment would be as idle as the watchfulneſs of a Shepherd againſt wolves, in a country where there are no ſuch beaſts, nor could be any. Let it not be objected that one body deſtroys another; that fire deſtroys wood, that one man kills another, &c. for this is not a deſtruction of creatures, but only a change of modifications. Modes or accidents are not conſidered as the ſubject of creation, but the ſubſtances they reſide in.

(17) See Mr. Bernier's book, printed at Amſterdam in 1685, and entitled, Traite du libre & du volontaire.

(18) It was John Bon, a Phyſician. His body of Philoſophy was printed.

[E] It being he whom Theophilus Raynaud hints at, in the paſſage I quote from his Hoplotheca.] After ſaying, that the ſubtle Scotus is falſely accuſed of admitting a kind of real diſtinction between the divine eſſence and its attributes, he adds, that he had lately, converſed in Orange with an apoſtate, who made uſe of Scotus's authority in ſupport of a new blaſphemy. Placuit hanc crambem obiter hic recoquere, quia his ipſis diebus Araufficæ, murcus FIDEI DESERTOR, blaſphemiam novam, Scoti autoritate tegere eſt auſus (19). This blaſphemy was, that the three perſonalities of the Trinity are modes of the divine eſſence properly ſo called. He obſerves that this innovator, (19) Theoph. Raynaud, Hoplotb. ſect. 2. ſerie 1. cap. 6. p. 89. This book was printed at Lyons in 1650.

ROHAN (RENATA DE), daughter of Lewis de Rohan IV. of that name, Lord of Guemené (a), was accidently the cauſe of a murder, which had like to have excited great diſorders in the Court of France, a little after the death of Francis II. [A]. She was widow to Francis de Rohan, Lord of Gié, and was courted by Count de Laval (b). The baſtard de Bueil, ſon to Count de Sancerre, and one of the moſt ſignal friends and champions of the Duke of Guiſe, reſolving to oppoſe that courtſhip, not ſatisfied with being this Counts's rival, had inſolently given out that this widow, after having written a promiſe of marriage and ſigned it with her own hand, had indulged him the laſt favour. Poſſibly he had no other view in this but to divert Laval and the reſt of his rivals from courting that Lady; but Laval looked upon it as one of thoſe affronts, which nothing but blood can atone for [B]. But not having ſo much regard to the baſtard, as to do him the honour to fight with him, he took him at an advantage, and killed him in Orleans (c). The conſtable of Montmorenci approved this action, and endeavoured to procure a pardon for Laval (d): but the Guiſes ſolicited to have this murderer puniſhed; and their credit was ſo ſuperior in the Council, that the King of Navarre, whoſe palace was Laval's ſanctuary, was obliged to ſend him away privately in the night. His eſtate was afterwards ſeized (e). Thoſe Writers, who affirm, that the reaſon why the Conſtable favoured the murderer was, that he was related to him, are not miſtaken [C]. Our Renata married Renatus de Laval (f); and for her third huſband, John de Laval, Marquis of Neſle.

(a) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grands Officiers, p. 536.

(b) Renatus de Laval, Lord of Loire.

(c) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX. Tom. 1. p. 8.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grands Officiers, p. 537.

vator, who had quoted Scotus to him, had not employed his authority in the diſpute de Suppoſito. This is an indication that he ſpeaks of Derodon. Here follows another proof. Perperam tam craſſus error, continues he, ſimplicitatem divinam & puriſſimam actualitatem exſcindens tanti viri (Scoti) ſuffragio calumnioſè captato munitus eſt ab eo, quem retuli ſpurco fidei deſertore male Rotundo (20). i. e. "So groſs an error "as this, which deſtroys the ſimplicity of the divine "nature, and the purity of its eſſence, ſhould not "have been ſaid to be grounded on the authority "of ſo great a man as Scotus; as is unjuſtly inſinuat-"ed by that ſhameful deſerter of the faith whom I "ſpoke of before, and who cannot be called round "in a good ſenſe." This laſt word is a manifeſt illuſion to the name of the perſon he intends to point out, I mean Derodon. He employed the ſame play of words in another book three years after, wherein he refuted Derodon, who aſſerted, that S. Cyril did not write the work entitled Theſaurus aſcribed to him. Eidem S. Cyrillo ſuppoſitum eſſe opus quod inſcribitur Theſaurus contendit ſpurcus hæreticus, autor diſputationis de ſuppoſito, quam nuperrime ementito nomine loci ſuoque ſuppreſſo, homo male teres atque ROTUNDUS edidit Arauſicæ. In ea diſputatione, quæ eſt una jugis hæreſeon & atrociſſimarum calumniarum lepra, nebulo qui in S. Cyrillum maxime rabit abjudicat ei opus Theſauri (21). i. e. "That filthy heretic, who wrote his diſpute de "Suppoſito, publiſhed by him lately, in Orange, with-"out his name, and the fictitious name of the town "where printed, affirms, that the book entitled The-"ſaurus is erroneouſly aſcribed to S. Cyril. In the "courſe of this diſpute, which is one uninterrupted "ſcab of hereſies, and the moſt abominable ſlan-"ders; the knave, who inveighs in a moſt vile man-"ner againſt St. Cyril, declares that the work en-"titled Theſaurus was not wrote by him."

(20) Theo. Raynaud, ibid. p. 90.

(21) Idem, Erotemat. de malis ac bonis Libris, num. 209. p. m. 134. See Father Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. 1. p. 243.

[A] A little after the death of Francis II.] Varillas ſays (1), it was three days after that Prince's death; but he miſtook, for want of duly attending to Thuanus's Latin. Triduo poſt de Vicedomini Carnutum morte allatum eſt . . . in idem tempus incidit Buellii . . . . cædes (2). Had he attended to the preceding words, he would have found that triduo relates to Decemb. 21 (3), the date of a reſolution, the ſubſtance of which had been given by the hiſtorian. According to this account, the Vidame's death muſt have been known at Orleans the 24th of December. Now Francis II died the 5th of that month; conſequently there muſt have been an interval of more than three days between the King's death and the murder of the baſtard de Bueil. At the ſame time that I take notice of this error, I am ſenſible that it is not of any conſequence; but it is fit a reader ſhould know, what it is that leads writers into miſtakes. By the way, I do not pretend to affirm, that the Vidame of Chartres died fifteen or ſixteen days after the King: I only mean, that if we follow Thuanus's account, we muſt judge pretty nearly of it in this manner; however, I would not adviſe any perſon to truſt to it. My reaſon is, Thuanus has followed Preſident de la Place, who is no ways accurate, with regard to chronology, in this place; the account he gives being as follows: Francis II died the 5th of December 1560; the King of Navarre gives up the regency to the Queen-mother; a regulation is made the 21ſt of December, news is brought, three days after, of the Vidame de Chartres's death; the principal difficulties being removed by this regulation, a reſolution was taken to hold the eſtates; notwithſtanding the Proteſts of part of the Deputies; the Cardinal of Lorrain endeavours to obtain a commiſſion for addreſſing, in a ſpeech, the three eſtates of the kingdom, but this is not granted him; during this interval Sancerre's baſtard is killed; laſtly, the eſtates met the thirteenth day of December. Such is the plan Thuanus followed; ſo that one cannot fix, from thence, either the day that the Vidame died, or the day that the baſtard was killed.

(1) In the two editions of the Life of Charles IX.

(2) Thuan. lib. 25. p. 525.

(3) 12 Kalend. Januar.

[B] Laval looked upon it as one of thoſe affronts which nothing but blood can atone for.] We cannot form any other judgment, according to the wretched maxims of the point of honour, conſidering how indulgent Judges are towards thoſe who preſume to ſlander a woman's reputation. If an arrant ſlanderer, or an indiſcreet bragging fellow, was to be proſecuted for this, would they not be acquitted by their denying the charge, or by begging pardon, which yet cannot prevent ſuſpicions, nor evil tongues. This circumſtance prompts Dueliſts to do themſelves juſtice (4). Sancerre's baſtard doubtleſs expected a challenge; and he no doubt truſted to his courage and dexterity more than to the juſtice of his cauſe; for what juſtice can there be in a perſon's aſſerting, even tho' no lie is told on ſuch an occaſion, that he has obtained a favour of this kind? But the manner in which he was attacked rendered his defenſe of no ſervice to him.

(4) Buellius, qui earum (nuptiarum) ſpe ſe dejectum dolebat, ut impedimentum offerret à Renata ſibi datem fidem diceret, & ut erat pugnacitatis fama arrogans, parum honeſte de illuſtri fœmina loqueretur. Thuan. lib. 25. p. 525.

[C] Thoſe writers are not miſtaken who affirm it.] Preſident de la Place is one of theſe (5). Loué, ſays he, was ſupported by the Conſtable, becauſe he was great uncle to the ſaid Lady; and the ſaid Loué deſcended in a direct male line, from the Conſtable Matthew de Montmorency, as well as the ſaid Conſtable. Thuanus makes the ſame remark with reſpect to Renatus de Laval; Unde magna rurſus irarum ſeges inter Guiſianos & Momorantios orta eſt, cum illi Sancerræ Comiti adeſſent, hi Lavallum uti ex Matthæi Momorantii Equitum Magiſtri ſtirpe profectum tutarentur (6). i. e. "This "occaſioned another great conteſt between the houſes "of Guiſe and Montmorency; the former whereof "ſtood up for Count de Sancerre, and the latter for "Laval, as being deſcended from Matthew Mont-"morency the Conſtable." I cannot comprehend why Varillas, who had ſaid in the firſt edition of the life of Charles IX (17), that Count de Laval was of the houſe of Montmorency, expunged it in the ſecond. I eaſily conceive why he expunged, that this Count was brother-in-law to the Chatillons; this being a manifeſt falſity; whereas the other circumſtance agrees with the genealogy, of the houſe of Montmorency, publiſhed by du Cheſne (8).

(5) De l'Etat de la Relig. & Republiq. liv. 2. towards the end.

(6) Thuan. lib. 25. p. 525.

(7) Tom. 1. p. 8. Dutch edit.

(8) Anſelme, Hiſt. des grands Officiers de la Couronne, p. 19.

[A] The

ROHAN (ANNE DE), daughter of Renatus de Rohan, and Catharine de Parthenai, heireſs of the Houſe of Soubiſe, was as illuſtrious for her genius and piety, as for her birth. She was ſiſter to Duke de Rohan, the main ſupport of the Proteſtants, during the civil wars under Lewis XIII. I have ſaid elſewhere (a), that ſhe bore, with an heroic reſolution, the calamities of the ſiege of Rochelle, which grew to ſuch an height, that ſhe was forced, during three months, to live on horſe-fleſh, and four ounces of bread every day. The Hiſtorian (b), who informs me of this, adds, that ſhe and her mother refuſed to be included in the capitulation, and remained priſoners of war. He beſtows the following encomium upon her; that ſhe was famous for her exemplary piety, among all the Proteſtants, as well as for her learning, in which ſhe ſurpaſſed all her ſex. She was a fine poeteſs, of which the excellennt Poem ſhe wrote on the death of Henry IV. [A] is a proof. What is ſaid concerning her ſkill in the Hebrew tongue is extraordinary [B]. She died unmarried in Paris the 20th of September 1646, in the ſixty ſecond year of her age. Madam Schurman wrote ſome letters to her, which are inſerted in the collection of her works.

(a) In the art. of Catharine de PARTHENAI.

(b) Hiſt. du Duc de Rohan, Paris 1666.

[A] The excellent poem ſhe wrote on the death of Henry IV.] D'Aubigné, who was not laviſh of his applauſe, has introduced part of it at the concluſion of his hiſtory, and introduced it with theſe words: I ſhall make uſe of the words of Anne de Rohan, Princeſs of Leon, and of all thoſe who write well in this age, becauſe her expreſſions are better than mine: this heavenly genius delivering herſelf as follows:

Quoi? faut-il que Henri, ce redouté Monarque,
Ce dompteur des humains, ſoit dompté par la Parque?

" Alas! muſt Henry, that far-dreaded Monarch,
" Victor of men, be vanquiſhed by the fates?

I would not have quoted theſe two verſes, but that they furniſh me with a ſubject for criticiſm. Peliſſon having ſaid (1), that Malherbe looked upon it as a maxim, that adjectives which terminate in e maſculine, ought never to be placed before the ſubſtantive, but after, whereas ſuch as have a feminine termination may be placed either before or after, as the Poet might think proper; that one might ſay, for inſtance, the redoutable Monarque, or ce Monarque redoutable; and on the contrary, that one might ſay, ce Monarque redouté, but not ce redouté Monarque; Peliſſon, I ſay, having expreſſed himſelf thus, continues as follows: I did not take this example, without juſt reaſon and at random, I having often heard Mr. de Gombaud ſay, that before this remark had been made, Malherbe and he walking one day together, and ſpeaking of certain verſes of Mademoiſelle Anne de Rohan, in which was the following,

(1) Hiſt. de l'Academie Franc. p. m. 178.

Quoy faut-il que Henri, ce redouté Monarque,

Malherbe declared ſeveral times, that he did not like the cloſe of that verſe, but why he could not tell; that this obliged him at laſt to conſider it attentively, and that having immediately diſcovered the reaſon of it, he informed Malherbe of it, who was as overjoyed as if he had found a treaſure, and afterwards formed this general rule from it. Now here follows Menage's obſervation which is not very well grounded. Mr. de Gombauld, ſays he (2), has alſo often informed me of this converſation he had with Malherbe, but not directly in the ſame manner as related by Pelliſſon; he having always told me, that it was he who took notice that redouté Monarque was bad. However it be, this rule whether it be of Malherbe or Mr. Gombaud . . . . is abſolutely falſe. He proves (3) it by example, and ſhews that Malherbe himſelf did not obſerve it, ſince he has ſaid in two places aſſeuré ſecours. But this is not what I would be at. I affirm that Menage underſtood theſe words of Peliſſon, as if they ſignified that it was Malherbe, and not Gombaud, who had found the reaſon of the fault in the verſe in queſtion; for had he not underſtood them in that manner, he could not have expreſſed himſelf thus; this rule, whether of Malherbe or Gombaud. It is plain the meaning of this is, that it is Malherbe's rule, according to Peliſſon's account, and that Gombaud found it out, if we may believe what Menage himſelf ſays he heard from Gombaud's own mouth; but it is ſtill plainer, that Peliſſon aſcribes the diſcovery to this latter, and no ways to Malherbe. Who now will wonder, that perſons do not underſtand a Latin paſſage for want of proper attention, ſince we here perceive that Menage does not underſtand a French Author, though this latter expreſſed himſelf in the moſt intelligible manner?

(2) Obſervations ſur les Poeſies de Malherbe, p. 302.

(3) Idem, ibid.

[B] What is ſaid concerning her ſtill in the Hebrew tongue is extraordinary.] She read the Old Teſtament in that language; and, inſtead of ſinging the Pſalms, at Church, in French verſe, as the reſt of the congregation did, ſhe meditated upon them in Hebrew: Hanc illuſtriſſimam & ſapientiſſimam Principem Hebraicis Literis haud leviter fuiſſe tinctam teſtis fuit αὐτόπτης Rev. Parens, dum Pariſiis degeret; quotieſcunque enim ipſam adiret, Vet. Teſtamenti caput aliquod Hebraicè legentem inveniebat, &, quod mirere, ne in Eccleſia quidem hocce ſtudium deſeruit, cùm etiam illic, dùm Hymni Davidici decantarentur, ipſa interim Hebraico idiomate mente pſalleret (4). i. e. " My father, during his abode in Paris, was an eye-witneſs how well ſkilled that moſt illuſtrious and moſt wiſe Princeſs was, in the Hebrew tongue; for ſo often as he waited upon that Lady, he always found her reading a chapter in the Hebrew Bible; and, a circumſtance which will raiſe your wonder is, ſhe did not leave this ſtudy, even when at Church; for there, whilſt the reſt of the congregation were ſinging David's Pſalms, ſhe ſung them over, in Hebrew, to herſelf." Colomeſius, from whom I borrow this account, gives an authority that deſerves to be copied (5).

(4) Colomes, in Gallia Orientali, p. 165.

(5) Hujus in Hebraicis peritiam firmat Phil. Aquinas Epiſtola Præfat. in capitula Patrum, a ſe ex Hebræo in Gallicum ſermonem verſa. Idem, ibid.

RONSARD (PETER DE), a French Poet, of a noble family [A], was born in Vendomois, the ſame year that Francis I. was taken priſoner before Pavia. This circumſtance

[A] Of a noble family.] Lewis de Ronſard, his father, was Knight of the Holy Ghoſt, and ſteward to Francis I, who made choice of him, to accompany Francis, Dauphin of Viennois, and Henry Duke of Orleans, his ſons, into Spain, whilſt they were hoſtages there, for the King their father (1). He married Jane de Chandrier, whoſe family was related to that of Trimouille, and conſequently to that of Craon; from whom the Kings of England are deſcended, by the marriage of the Empreſs Maud (2) ſo that he (3) made it evident, that Ronſard was related, in the ſixteenth or ſeventeenth degree, to Elizabeth Queen of England. It is ſaid that Lewis de Ronſard ſprung from a Baldwin, younger brother of a great family (4), on the confines of Hungary and Bulgaria, who had brought a company of Gentlemen to King Philip of Valois (5). Nay, it is pretended that there is a Lordſhip called the Marquiſate of Ronſard (6) in that part where the Danube flows neareſt to Thrace (7); but I am of opinion that we may rank all this among the great number of chimerical

(1) Binet, in Ronſard's Life, Tom. 9. of Ronſard's works, in 12mo, p. 113. It is to be obſerved, that du Perron, in the funeral oration of Ronſard, p. 189, of the ſame vol. does not ſay that Lewis de Ronſard was Steward to Francis I. but to Henry II.

(2) Binet, ibid. p. 112.

(3) That is, the Sieur du Fauz of Angero, in his Memoirs. In my edit. it is the Sieur de Faur; but I am informed by La Croix du Maine, that this Author's name was Paſcal Robin du Fauz.

(4) Binet, Vie de Ronſard, p. 112.

(5) Ibid. p. 113.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Ibid. p. 112.

cumſtance of time has given occaſion to ſome injudicious reflections [B]. He had like to have loſt his life on the day he was born; and the danger he was in gave riſe to ſome conceits as injudicious as the reflections in queſtion [C]. He put himſelf at the head of ſome merical ſtories, which moſt noble families relate concerning their founders (8). They are paſſionately fond of declaring themſelves deſcended from the moſt diſtant countries; and from ſome younger brother of noble extraction, a valiant adventurer, whoſe noble exploits deſerved infinite reward from the Prince he came to ſerve. If ſuch particulars were related only by three or four families, people would not be ſo much inclined to laugh. By the way, the Author I quote only turned into proſe, what Ronſard had related concerning his extraction in one of his elegies (9). Du Perron (10) told the ſame ſtory, but put Moravia inſtead of Bulgaria. The collection of the fineſt pieces of the French poets, printed in 1692, contains (11) a life of Ronſard, in which he is ſaid to come originally from Hungary and Bulgaria. If this is not an abſurdity, it is at leaſt a falſification; for the tradition of this family does not aſcribe two native countries to his anceſtors, but only one, on the confines of Hungary and Bulgaria. Theſe are Claudius Binet's words; and theſe are the miſtakes which writers are apt to fall into, when they attempt to change the words of the original, whether to ſhorten them, or to modernize the ſtyle. The word confines ought not to have been ſuppreſſed here.

(8) Vide rem. [C] of the art. PINET.

(9) It is in the 22d, and is inſcribed to Belleau.

(10) Ronſard's funeral oration, p. 188.

(11) Tom. 1. p. 239.

[B] Some injudicious reflections.] "From the marriage of Lewis and John de Chandrier, ſprung "Peter de Ronſard, in the Caſtle of la Poiſſonniere ". . . . on Saturday the 11th of September 1524, "on which day King Francis I was taken before "Pavia. It may be made a queſtion whether France "received more injury by this unhappy capture, than "advantage by this auſpicious birth of Ronſard, "which was ſignalized, like that of other great "men, by ſo memorable an incident. Thus the "birth of Alexander the Great was ſignalized, and "illuminated, as it were, by the burning of the tem"ple of Diana in the city of Epheſus (12)." This muſt needs be a noble compenſation! and the French muſt have been ſufficiently indemnified for the impriſonment of their King, an incident which brought the King down to the brink of ruin, and was the cauſe of a long ſeries of loſſes, ignominious and fatal to the nation; the French, I ſay, muſt have been ſufficiently indemnified, ſince a man of wit was born that day among them, who has enriched them with the Lord knows how many thouſand verſes in ſonnets, madrigals, ſtanzas, hymns, odes, &c. This thought of Claudius Binet would be tolerable only only in ſome panegyrical poem; and even there it would call for indulgence, and be conſidered as a cold hyperbole by perſons of good taſte. This doubtleſs was the reaſon why du Perron did not introduce it in Peter Ronſards's funeral oration (13). What ſhall we ſay, when we ſee it in proſe, in a hiſtory, I mean in Ronſard's life? But what ſhall we ſay of Thuanus, that grave, that venerable Magiſtrate, who relates the ſame thought with a very ſerious air, in a general hiſtory that is a maſter-piece in its kind? Natus erat (Petrus Ronſardus) ſays he (14), eodem, quo infeliciter à noſtris ad Ticinum pugnatum eſt, anno, ut ipſe in Elegia ad Remigium Bellaqueum ſcribit, quaſi Deus jacturam nominis Gallici eo prælio factam & ſecutum ex illo veluti noſtrarum rerum interitum tanti viri ortu compenſare voluerit. i. e. "Peter Ronſard was "born, as he himſelf informs us in an elegy he "inſcribes to Peter Belleau, the ſame year that our "Countrymen met with ſo ſignal a defeat before Pa"via; as though providence had been deſirous of "compenſating, by the birth of ſo illuſtrious a man, "the great wound which the honour of the French "nation received by that battle, and the ſad calamities "which were thereby brought upon them." It is to be obſerved, that Thuanus does not fix the birth of the Poet, and the battle of Pavia, on the ſame day, but ſays only that they happened the ſame year; but Claudius Binet thinking there was not enough of the marvellous in this idea, affirmed that both thoſe incidents happened on the ſame day. But he betrays himſelf, and diſcovers the falſity of his own making; for he declares that this Poet was born the 11th of September 1524; and all the world knows that Francis I was beat before Pavia the 24th of February 1525: however, Ronſard was born the ſame year, according to the way of calculating at that time; for the year did not then begin on the firſt of January in France; it not beginning till Eaſter, and conſequently the battle of Pavia was included in the year 1524. Let it not be objected that there is an error of the preſs in Binet's book, for this cannot be; for when this Author ſays that Peter Ronſard died the 27th of December 1585, he declares his age to be ſixty one years, three months, and ſixteen days (15). He therefore imagined that he was born the eleventh of September 1524, whence, by the way, we will take notice of an error of Sammarthanus (16). However, I muſt not omit that there is ſome uncertainty in the matter which might render him excuſable. We know only, from a paſſage of Ronſard, that he was born the ſame year that Francis I was taken priſoner; at leaſt it is certain that du Perron brought no other proof, in oppoſition to ſuch as were not of that opinion. "As to the "time of his birth, ſays he (17), people differ in "their opinion. Some think he was born in the "year one thouſand, five hundred and twenty two; "and conſequently that he died in the great cli"macteric, a circumſtance that has been obſerved of "many great perſons. Others depend on what he "himſelf ſays; he having ſignalized the year of his "birth by the taking of the great King Francis, as "the birth of eminent perſonages is often diſtin"guiſhed by ſuch remarkable incidents. We here "may alſo obſerve by the way, that the taking of "this King priſoner before Pavia, by which inci"dent Ronſard denotes the year of his birth, falls "on the very day on which we celebrate the memory "of his death, viz. the feaſt of St. Mathias (18)." But this proof of du Perron will be found weak, when the reader is informed that Ronſard, in one of his poems, declares himſelf to be of an age which does not ſuit with a man born in 1524 or 1525. Here follow his words, which border a little on obſcenity, and are not well ſuited to the ſubject; but he was replying to ſome ſevere and ſneering adverſaries, who, among other particulars, accuſed him of leading a voluptuous life.

(12) Binet, Vie de Ronſard, p. 113.

(13) See citat. 18 hereunder.

(14) Thuan. lib. 82. ſub fin. p. m. 43. ad ann. 1585.

Tu dis que je ſuis vieil, encore n'ay-je atteint
Trente & ſept ans paſſez & mon corps ne ſe plaint
D'ans ny de maladie, & en toutes les ſortes
Mes nerfs ſont bien tendus, & mes veines bien fortes;
Et ſi j'ay le teint palle & le cheveu griſon,
Mes membres toutesfois ne ſont hors de ſaiſon (19).

"You ſay I'm old, and yet I've not attain'd
"My thirty ſeventh year; nor does my body
"Complain of ill effects from age or ſickneſs.
"My nerves are ſtretch'd, and all my veins ſhew
"vigour;
"And tho' I'm pale, and ſilver-hair'd my locks,
"Yet all my limbs exert a wiſh'd for ſtrength."

(15) Binet, Vie de Ronſard, p. 156.

(16) Neque ſexageſimum ætatis annum exceſſit (Ronſardus) articulari morbo ſæviſſimo vexatus. Sammarthan. Elogior. lib. 1. p. m. 80.

(17) Du Perron, Oraiſon funebre de Ronſard, p. m. 190.

(18) I quoted the whole paſſage, to ſhew what I ſaid above, citat. 15, that Du Perron did not make uſe of the pretended compenſation for the impriſonment of Francis I.

(19) Ronſard, Reponſe à quelque Miniſtre, p. 86. Tom. 9. of his works, in 12mo.

The poem, in which he ſpeaks thus, was wrote ſome weeks after the Duke of Guiſe's death (20), and conſequently, in the ſpring of the year 1563. A man, who was then but thirty ſeven years of age, muſt have been born in 1526, and at this rate Scævola Sammarthanus ought not to blamed. It is ſomething ſurprizing that our Poet himſelf did not know exactly the year he was born.

(20) See the epiſtle prefixed to this poem.

[C] . . . . Conceits as injudicious as the reflections in queſtion.] "The day of his birth had like to have "been that of his burial; for as he was carrying to "be chriſtned, from the country-ſeat of la Poiſſon"niere, to the Church of the place, the woman who "carried him, as ſhe was croſſing a meadow, hap"pened to let him fall down, but it was on the graſs "and flowers, ſo that he had a very gentle fall. "Another accident happened on this occaſion, viz. "a Gentlewoman, who carried a veſſel filled with "roſe-water, and various herbs and flowers, accord"ing ſome ſoldiers in Vendomois in 1562, and made all the ſlaughter in his power of the Proteſtants [D] ; a circumſtance that gave occaſion to the publiſhing ſome vaſtly bitter ſatyrical pieces againſt him at Orleans, and in which it was ſuppoſed he was a Prieſt : but

" ing to the uſual cuſtom, going to take the child, " ſpilt on its head ſome of that odoriferous water, " which was an omen of the fragrancy from his " learned writings, which would be ſpread over the " kingdom (21)." This is called concetti by the Italians. Mr. le Pays did not forget to make ſome verſes on this thought, when he wrote the hiſtory of Ronſard's muſe. He was the ſon of a knight of the Holy Ghoſt, and came into the world on the day that Francis I. was taken priſoner at the battle of Pavia. It has been ſaid, to his glory, that France would have been always inconſolable for ſo unfortunate a day, had not ſo great a man been born that day in it. The day of his birth had like to have been that of his death. A Gentlewoman who carried him (22) from the Caſtle of la Poiſſonniere, where he was born, to the pariſh Church where he was baptized, was ſo heedleſs as to let him fall : but happily this was in a meadow, and upon flowers ; and the only hurt he met with, was, to be quite wetted with the roſe water, which was carrying, according to the uſual cuſtom, for that chriſtning.

(21) Claude Binet, Vie de Ronſard, p. 114.

(22) Binet does not ſay that the Gentlewoman carried the child ; he ſaying that another carried him.

Ce ne fut point ſans doute un effet du hazard,
Je croi qu'on peut ſans badinage,
Dire que ce fut un preſage
De la fortune de Ronſard ;
Un preſage certain qui fit alors comprendre,
Combien de bonne odeur Ronſard devoit répandre,
Un preſage certain que les neuf doctes Sœurs,
Dont il devoit chanter la gloire,
Pour éterniſer ſa memoire
Luy feroient quelque jour des couronnes de fleurs (23).

" It, doubtleſs, was not the effect of chance ;
" Methinks it may, without a joke, be ſaid,
" To ſpeak the heaven-born Ronſard's future for" tune.
" An omen, which declar'd, that very inſtant,
" The charming fragrance he muſt one day ſhed :
" A certain omen that the tuneful nine,
" Whoſe glory he muſt ſing, to eternize him,
" Wou'd one day weave a chaplet for his head."

(23) Le Pays, Titres de Nobleſſe de la Muſe Amourette, p. 182, 183. part 2. of Nouvelles Oeuvres, Dutch edit. 1687.

[D] He put himſelf at the head of ſome ſoldiers .... againſt the Proteſtants.] Here follows the account, which Beza gives of this. " The moſt grievous " circumſtance was, that among the images which " were broke by the populace, they demoliſhed ſome " Sepulchres of the houſe of Vendoſme, now head " of the houſe of Bourbon, which was very juſtly " thought a very bad action. The Roman Catho- " licks ſeeing this, and as ſome of the nobility of " the Province were gone to meet the Prince of Or- " leans, and others had thrown themſelves into the " town of Mons, they began to exerciſe a heavy " hand over the Proteſtants. Among the reſt Peter " Ronſard, a Gentleman who poſſeſſed all the graces " of French Poetry, in a greater degree than any of " his contemporaries, but who, at the ſame time, " let out his muſe to hire, not only to write on the " moſt obſcene ſubjects, but likewiſe to calumniate " our religion and all who profeſſed it, having turned " Prieſt, was determined to engage in thoſe quarrels " with his companions. Accordingly having aſſem- " bled, for this purpoſe, ſome ſoldiers in the village " of Evaille, of which he was Paſtor, he made ſeve- " ral excurſions, on which occaſion he got plunder " and committed ſome murders (24)." Spondanus ſays, that the nobility of Vendôme made choice of Ronſard the Prieſt for their leader : but I had rather follow the account given us by Beza. However, I will cite the words of the above-mentioned Annaliſt, and we ſhall find ſome other particulars in them that want to be corrected. Arma quoque ſumens nobilitas, ducem ſibi elegit Ronſardum, qui inſolentiam profanorum non ferens, multos ex iis malè mulctavit : quamquam curionatum Evalliæ tenebat, loci amœnitate aut commoditate captus. Neque enim is erat, qui libertatem ſuam, atque adeò licentiam poëticam, ſacerdotalis muneris neceſſitate tamquam compede ad gravitatem eâ functione dignam vellet adſtringere : ſed homo generoſus, & à teneris annis inter nobiles pueros Caroli Ducis Aureliani Franciſci I. filii in aulâ, & poſteà militaribus ſtudiis in Angliâ & Scotiâ innutritus, antequàm literis ſub Io. Aurato operam daret, & divinum ingenium ad poëticam appelleret, inter pacatæ vitæ oblectamenta etiam armorum curam & amorem retinuerat (25). Theſe words give us to underſtand, that Ronſard undertook a cure of ſouls only for his pleaſure, and that he diſcharged the ſacerdotal functions in a very blunt manner. If this Author had known, that this pretended Pariſh Prieſt had had the ſame place under the King of Scotland, as under the Duke of Orleans, would he have employed ſuch a diſtinction as he has done ? Would he have ſaid that Peter Ronſard was a page under that Duke, and learnt the military art under the King of Scotland ? Let us therefore rectify this ; and inform the reader that this young man was appointed page to the Dauphin in 1536, three days before that Prince's deceaſe (26). He afterwards entered into the ſervice of Charles Duke of Orleans, the King's ſecond ſon, and continued in it ſeveral years to the great ſatisfaction of his maſter . . . who in order that he might ſee the world, got him to be page to James Stuart, King of Scotland, who was come to marry (27) the Lady Magdalen, daughter to King Francis. The King of Scotland took him into his Kingdim, and he reſided there two years (28) and ſix months in England, after which he returned to France, and retired to his maſter the Duke of Orleans, who made him page of his ſtables, and ſent him upon ſome affair to Flanders and Zealand, with expreſs orders to proceed as far as Scotland, which he did . . . Being returned from this voyage, and not above fifteen or ſixteen years of age ; having lived five years with the Duke of Orleans till his death, and being next in the ſervice of Henry who was afterwards King, in 1540 he went in the retinue of Lazarus de Baif . . . who was ſetting out as his Majeſty's Embaſſador, for the Diet of Spire (29). It appears from this relation, 1. That Ronſard did not learn the art of war in Scotland, any otherwiſe than in the Duke of Orleans's ſervice, or as all the pages of Princes learn it. 2. That Spondanus expreſſed himſelf improperly ; and did not know that our Poet, when in Scotland, was but thirteen or fourteen ; and that, at his return to France, he was appointed page to the Dauphin's brother. It perhaps may be objected to me, that I ought not to refute that Annaliſt, by the account given by Claudius Binet, as this abounds with errors. I will take it for granted that this is a difficulty ; but nevertheleſs I may ſtill ſuppoſe that Claudius Binet is not miſtaken, with regard to the time when Peter Ronſard was appointed page to the King of Scotland. He nevertheleſs is groſsly miſtaken in his calculation ; for had Ronſard lived in the Duke of Orleans's ſervice five years, and till his death, he muſt have lived with that Prince till the year 1545 ; and if he was afterwards in the ſervice of the Dauphin Henry, how could he poſſibly have afterwards been put into the retinue of Lazarus de Baif in 1540 ? But it is true that Lazarus de Baif, going as the King's Embaſſador to Germany in 1540, took with him our Ronſard who was then no longer under the diſcipline of his tutors (30). Be this as it will, Varillas has fallen into the ſame miſtake into which Spondanus leads his readers. " New puniſhments were invented, " to chaſtiſe the Calviniſts of Vendôme, becauſe the " moſt violent among them had ranſacked the Se- " pulchres of the anceſtors of the King of Navarre. " And the famous Poet Ronſard, a Gentleman of that " country, who, grown weary of the Court, and of " the narrow circumſtances in which he lived at " home, had accepted of the living of Evailles, took " up arms again, as he had formerly done in Eng- " land and Scotland. He afterwards made an excuſe " for it, with this merry ſaying, that as he had " found it impoſſible for him to defend his pariſhioners " with St. Peter's keys, which the Calviniſts neither " dreaded nor reſpected, he therefore had taken up " the ſword of St. Paul ; when putting himſelf at " the

(24) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſ. liv. 7. p. 557, 558.

(25) Spondanus, Annal. Eccleſ. ad ann. 1562. num. 16. p. m. 621, 622.

(26) Binet, Vie de Ronſard, p. 115.

(27) He married her at Paris the 1ſt of January 1537.

(28) Du Perron, Oraiſon funebre de Ronſard, p. 193, declares, that he lived two years and a half in Scotland.

(29) Extracted from Claudius Binet, p. 115 & ſeq.

(30) See Anthony Baif's verſes, in Menage's Remarques ſur la Vie d'Ayrault, p. 196.

but he defended himſelf in verſe, and denied his being an Eccleſiaſtic [E]. A certain circumſtance is, that he had ſome benefices in commendam; and among others, the Priory of St. Coſmus near Tours. He died the 27th of December 1585, and was buried in that

" the head of the nobility in the neighbourhood, he " had preſerved the village and Church to which he " belonged from being plundered (31)." We here find that he falſely ſuppoſes that Ronſard had carried arms in England and Scotland. [" Bayle declares " this article, that Ronſard was not Paſtor of Evaille; " but this is ſuppoſing a falſe fact, viz. that a per- " ſon cannot be the Paſtor or Rector of a Pariſh " without being a Prieſt. See alſo the following " remark *."]

(31) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX. Tom. 1. p. 171. Dutch edit. ad ann. 1562.

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 893. col. 2.

[E] He defended himſelf in verſe, and denied his being an Eccleſiaſtick.] Chandieu and Florent Chretien (both Proteſtant Miniſters) wrote the pieces that were publiſhed againſt him in Orleans. The former diſguiſed himſelf under the name of A. Zamariel B. de Mont-Dieu, and the ſecond under that of François de la Baronnie (32). Father Garaſſe ſpeaks of this as follows. " Theſe two men made him a moſt ſevere repri- " mand, entitled, La Metamorphoſe de Ronſard en " Preſtre, ou le Temple de Ronſard, (The Metamor- " phoſis of Ronſard into a Prieſt, or Ronſard's Tem- " ple;) in which they charge him, in particular, " with having taught atheiſm.

(32) See Doctrine Curieuſe du Pere Garaſſe, p. 126, and 1022; and La Croix du Maine, p. 88.

" Je t'ay veu diſcourir tout ainſi qu'Epicure
" Qui attacheois au ciel un Dieu qui n'a la cure
" De ce qu'on fait en bas, & en parlant ainſi
" Tu monſtrois que de luy tu n'avois grand ſoucy, &c.

" I've heard you argue, juſt as Epicurus;
" And fix, in Heaven, a God who diſregards
" Whatever's done below; and ſpeak I thus,
" You plainly ſhew'd how little you eſteem'd him.

" But Ronſard made a ſolid anſwer to their ſcurrili- " ties and impertinences, in the poem entitled, Des " miſeres du temps, in which he proteſts, &c (33)." Garaſſe is miſtaken. The poem entitled Des miſeres du temps was not writ in anſwer to Zamariel & la Baronnie; but the piece which Ronſard wrote in his own defenſe againſt them, is entitled, Reponſe aux injures & calomnies de je ne ſçai quels Predicantereaux & Miniſtreaux de Geneve. The reaſon, which excited the Proteſtants to write verſes againſt this Poet, is related imperfectly both by Binet and Varillas. One of them ſays, that they abuſed him, in revenge of the poems he had writ againſt him; the other affirms that they ſatyrized him on account of his military exploits. Now theſe two reaſons ſhould have been joined together; it being certain that they attacked him, becauſe he had employed both the ſword and the pen againſt them with great fury. Binet's words are as follow: " This " gave Ronſard an occaſion of oppoſing that new " opinion, and of arming the Muſes in defenſe of " France; he publiſhing remonſtrances, which were " judged ſo proper to combat the enemies of the " Catholick religion, that the King, and the Queen " his mother rewarded him for it; as likewiſe did " Pope Pius V. who thanked him for it by letters " written expreſsly for that purpoſe. For this rea- " ſon thoſe of the new opinion (the Proteſtants) be- " gan to attack him; and wrote a very ſharp ſatyri- " cal poem againſt him, entitled by them, Ronſard's " Temple, in which they painted his life in tapeſtry, " as it were. They alſo wrote ſome anſwers to his " remonſtrances, with the following remonſtrance, " La Metamorphoſe de Ronſard, the Authors of " which were one A. Zamariel, and B. de Mont-dieu, " both Proteſtant Miniſters, the laſt of whom he " points out plainly enough, in the verſes he wrote to " him by way of anſwer, comparing him to Siſy- " phus.

(33) Garaſſe, ibid. p. 126, 127.

" Qui remonte & repouſſe aux enfers un rocher
" Dont tu as pris ton nom (34).

" Who, deep in Hell, for ever heaves a rock
" (Which ſtill falls back,) whence thou thy name
" haſt borrowed.

(34) Binet, Vie de Ronſard, p. 138, 139. See alſo l'Oraiſon funebre par du Perron, p. 197, where no other reaſon is found but that alledged by Binet.

Here Binet makes two Authors of one, A. Zamariel B. de Mont-dieu, being but one man. I now proceed to Varillas's words. This (35) gave occaſion to the horrid ſatyr, which Florent Chretien, at that time a violent Calviniſt, and Preceptor to the Prince of Navarre, wrote under the name of la Baronie the Proteſtant Miniſter, againſt Ronſard; and the anſwer of this latter, in which he ſhewed that indignation was capable of making him write finer verſes than nature, though he had a wonderful genius for Poetry (36). He ſhould not have ſaid that Florent Chretien wrote under the name of a Proteſtant Miniſter, nor to ſuppoſe that he was the only perſon who ſatyrized Ronſard. We have ſeen that he aſſerts, after Beza and Spondanus, that our Poet had a cure of ſouls; but we ſhall find that he was miſtaken.

(35) That is, becauſe Ronſard took up arms againſt the Proteſtants.

(36) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX. liv. 3. p. 171, 172.

Or ſus mon frere en Chriſt, tu dis que je ſuis Preſtre:
J'atteſte l'eternel que je le voudrois eſtre,
Et avoir tout le chef & le dos empeſché
Deſſous la peſanteur d'une boune Eveſché:
Lors j'auroy la couronne à bon droit ſur la teſte,
Qu'un raſoir blanchiroit le jour d'une grand' feſte,
Ouverte, large, longue, allant juſques au front.
En forme d'un Croiſſant qui tout ſe courbe en rond (37).

(37) Ronſard, Reponſe à quelque Miniſtre, p. m. 80.

" You tell me, brother, that I am a Prieſt;
" I ſwear, by Heaven, I gladly would be ſuch;
" And only wiſh my ſhoulders were weigh'd down
" With a fat Biſhoprick. I juſtly then
" Should wear a crown, made by the razor's edge;
" A crown, long, broad and wide, extending quite
" Around my forehead, in a creſcent's form.

Does not Ronſard expreſsly deny, in theſe verſes, his being a Prieſt? And would he have denied this, had he really been one? What follows, however, will excuſe the Proteſtant Miniſter who beſtowed that title on him. He had been ordained; and he diſcharged the functions of an Eccleſiaſtic, in the choir, with ſacerdotal veſtments, as he himſelf informs us.

Mais quand je ſuis aux lieux, où il faut faire voir
D'un cœur devotieux l'office & le devoir,
Lors je ſuis de l'Egliſe une colonne ferme,
D'un ſurpelis ondé les eſpaules je m'arme,
D'une haumuſſe le bras, d'une chape le dos,
Et non comme tu dis faite de croix & d'os:
C'eſt pour un Capelan, la mienne eſt honorée
De grandes boucles d'or & de frange dorée (38).
. . . . . .
Je ne perds un moment des prieres divines:
Dés la pointe du jour je m'en vais à matines,
J'ay mon breviaire au poing, je chante quelquefois,
Mais c'eſt bien rarement, car j'ay mauvaiſe vois,
Le devoir du ſervice en rien je n'abandonne,
Je ſuis à Prime, à Sexte, & à Tierce, & à Nonne,
J'oy dire la grand' Meſſe, & avecques l'encent
(Qui par l'Egliſe eſpars comme parfum ſe ſent,) J'honore mon Prelat des autres l'outrepaſſe,
Qui a pris d'Agenor ſon ſurnom & ſa race.
Apres le tour finy je viens pour me r'aſſoir (39).

(38) Ibid. p. 94.

(39) Ibid. p. 95.

" But when I am in ſacred places, where
" It is my duty to have great devotion,
" I then am ſeen a pillar of the church.
" A wavy ſurplice overſpreads my ſhoulders;
" My arm an ameſs bears, my back a cope;
" And not, as you do hint, of croſs and bones.
" 'Tis for a church-man; therefore 'tis adorn'd
" With large gold buckles, and a golden fringe.
. . . . . .
" At hours of prayer, I never loſe an inſtant;
" But go to mattins at the early dawn.
" My breviary in my hand, I ſing ſometimes;
" Yet very rarely, for my voice is bad.
" In ſervice time I'm ſure not to be abſent,
" Whether at prime, at terce, or ſexte or none.
" High-maſs I hear, with heavenly frankincenſe,
" (Which ſpreads delicious fragrance round the " church)
" I greet my Prelate, all the reſt excelling,
" Who

that place in a very private manner; but a noble monument was erected there to his memory four and twenty years after [F]. He was afflicted in a dreadful manner by the gout, which, it is ſaid, was owing to his debauched way of life [G]. There are a great number of amorous Poems in his works; by which we find that he had three principal miſtreſſes (a), the laſt of whom ſerved him only as an amuſement, and a ſubject for his poetry [H].

(a) See the rem. [H].

It is even true that he often wrote verſes in an amorous ſtrain, at the deſire of ſome Lords of the Court; theſe conſequently were a deſcription, not of his paſſion but of theirs. When he recollected this it uſed to give uneaſineſs; for he remembered, that theſe

" Who comes from Agenor; thence takes his " name.
" Theſe rites perform'd, I ſit me down again.

This made the Proteſtants ſuppoſe him to have had a cure of ſouls. I muſt obſerve, that Menage imagines that a Proteſtant Miniſter, whoſe name was Mont-dieu, wrote againſt Ronſard (40); but he is miſtaken, this being the feigned name which Chandieu the Miniſter aſſumed, when he publiſhed that piece. Baillet (41) is of opinion, that Florent Chretien made uſe of that fictitious name. Colomeſius had no reaſon to ſay, that La Croix du Maine did not know in his Biblioth. p. 88, that Florent Chretien wrote againſt Ronſard, under the name of Francis de la Baronnie (42). I have related elſewhere (43) the anſwer Ronſard made, to the charge brought againſt him, with regard to an heatheniſh act.

(40) Menage, Anti-Baillet, ch. 145.

(41) Baillet, in the catalogue des Auteurs deguiſez.

(42) Colomies, Bibl. Choiſie, p. 202.

(43) Rem. [D] of the art. JODELLE.

[F] A noble monument was erected there to his memory.] Joachim de la Chetardie, Counſellor Clerk in the Parliament of Paris, being Prior-commendatory of St. Coſmus, twenty years after Ronſard's death, was grieved to find that there was no mauſolæum, nor even ſo much as an inſcription, to ſhew where the aſhes of ſo great a Poet had been depoſited (44). For this reaſon, when he repaired the monaſtery, he cauſed a marble tomb to be made there, on which an epitaph (45) was engraved; and a fine ſtatue of Ronſard made by an excellent Sculpture erected. Cum magni Ronſardi cineres populari loculo, muto & illiterato jacere videret, melior æquiorque illis qui ejus opimis exuviis ditati ſunt, tamdiu manes eſſe neglectos non tulit, ac Ronſardum illum. . . . Chetardius marmoris alta ſtrue, ſtatua ad viventis ſimilitudinem veriſſime expreſſa, à Phidia Lutetiano donavit, brevi nota & elogio (46). A reflection is here caſt on Ronſard's relations, for not paying, in any manner, the tribute due to his memory. It is nevertheleſs certain, that Gallandius cauſed a ſplendid funeral ſervice to be made in his honour in the college of Boncourt, of which he was Principal. Teſtamento condito, quo hæredem ſcripſit Johannem Gallandium juventutis Pariſienſis optimum moderatorem, cujus hoſpitio cum Lutetiæ eſſet, familiariſſime utebatur qui dignam tanti viri memoriæ gratiam rependens ei exequiis perhonorificis poſtea in ſchola Becodiana ſua parentavit (47). Here follows a deſcription of his funeral. " The " Sieur Galland, whoſe affection for him not being " buried in the ſame grave, acting the part that " France ought to have done, cauſed pompous pre- " parations to be made in the chapel of Boncourt, " where his funeral obſequies were ſolemnized on " Monday the 24th of Feb. 1586. The ſervice being " ſet to muſick, and accompanied with inſtruments of " every kind, was ſung by the fineſt ſingers; thoſe " belonging to his Majeſty being there, by his expreſs " command; the King juſtly lamenting the death of " a perſon, who had been ſo great an ornament to " his Kingdom. I ſhould never have done, was I to " tranſcribe all the funeral orations, elogiums, and " verſes which were conſecrated that day to his me- " mory; and how many perſons of high diſtinction, " with that generous Prince Charles of Valois, ac- " companied with Duke de Joyeuſe, and the moſt " reverend Cardinal his brother, to whom Ronſard " belonged, honoured this funeral ſolemnity; at " which the moſt worthy Members of the auguſt Se- " nate at Paris, as at a publick ceremony, were pleaſed " to aſſiſt; theſe being followed by the greateſt wits " in France. Mr. du Perron, after dinner, ſpoke the " funeral oration with ſo much eloquence, and to " hear which, there was ſo vaſt a concourſe of audi- " tors, that the Cardinal of Bourbon, and ſeveral " other Princes and perſons of high diſtinction, were " obliged to go back, the crowd being ſo great they " could not get in (48)."

(44) See in what manner Paſquier ſhews his indignation, in his Recherch. book 7. ch. 11. p. 648. ſeeing ſo mean a ſepulchre.

(45) It is in Botereius, ubi infra, p. 567.

(46) Rodolphus Botereius, Commentar. de rebus in Gallia geſtis, lib. 16. p. 566. ad ann. 1609.

(47) Thuanus, Hiſt. lib. 80. ſub fin. p. m. 43. col. 1.

(48) Binet, p. 159, 160.

[G] He was afflicted . . . . . with the gout, which, it is ſaid, was owing to his debauched way of life.] He was handſom in his perſon, very robuſt; and as he was extremely witty, and vaſtly fond of pleaſure, we may naturally ſuppoſe that he improved every opportunity of being in company with the fair ſex, and that he ſeldom failed of ſuch opportunities. Thus he deſtroyed the vigour of his conſtitution by his ſenſual way of life, as Thuanus obſerves. Verum homo ut ingenio ſic forma & corporis robore inſignis cum vita ſoluta licentioſe nimis genio indulgeret, valetudinem firmiſſimam debilitavit, acerbiſſimis arthritidis doloribus extrema ætate conflictatus (49). He was very deaf; and it is confeſſed in his life, that one of the cauſes which brought that infirmity upon him was, that during his ſtay in Germany, he was obliged to drink ſuch wines as that country affords, moſt of which are ſophiſticated (50). But this is a miſtake; there being excellent wines in Germany; and had Ronſard drank moderately of them, they would not have hurt him. The Authors of the pieces publiſhed in Orleans reproach him with being a great debauchee.

(49) Thuan. lib. 83. p. 43. col. 1.

(50) Binet, p. 118.

Tu m'accuſes, Cafard, d'avoir eu la verolle :
Un chaſte Predicant de fait & de parole
Ne devroit jamais dire un propos ſi vilain :
Mais que ſort-il du ſac ? cela dont il eſt plein (51).
. . . . . .
Tu te plaints d'autre part que ma vie eſt laſcive,
En delices, en jeux, en vices exceſſive :
Tu mens meſchantement, ſi tu m'avois ſuivy
Deux mois, tu ſçaurois bien en quel eſtat je vy (52).

(51) Ronſard, Reponſe à quelque Miniſtre, p. 86.

(52) Ibid. p. 93.

" Bigot, thou chargeſt me with being pox'd :
" But, let me tell thee, a juſt, virtuous preacher
" Shou'd never utter ſuch obſcene expreſſions :
" But man will ſpeak oft as his heart ſuggeſts.
. . . . . .
" Again you tell me, that my life is lewd ;
" That vices, pleaſures, games, are my delight :
" But O thou lieſt ! and hadſt thou only liv'd
" Two months with me, the contrary thou'dſt prov'd.

(53) See what is ſaid concerning Malherbe, in the rem. [B] of his article.

[H] The laſt of his miſtreſſes ſerved him only as an amuſement, and a ſubject for his poetry (53)]. I will firſt ſpeak of the former two (54). " Ronſard fall- " ing in love with a beautiful young woman at Blois " named Caſſandra, the twenty firſt day of April, " in a journey he made to Blois, where the Court " then was, being then twenty years of age (55), " reſolved to celebrate her in verſe, as well for the " beauty of the ſubject, as of the name. He was " ſtruck the inſtant he ſaw her, as though it had " been by a divine inſtinct, which he ſeems to hint at " ſufficiently, by the following motto he then took, " ΩΣ ΙΔΟΝ ΩΣ ΕΜΑΝΗΝ (55)." The verſes he wrote on that miſtreſs were thought too obſcure, for which reaſon he reſolved to deſcribe, in a more eaſy ſtyle, the amours of Mary, who was a beautiful maiden of Anjou: and whom he frequently ſhadows under the name of Pin de Bourgeuil, that being the place of her abode, and where he firſt ſaw her, happening to be there with Baif his friend. He was extremely fond of her, after having made love to Caſſandra, during ten years, and left her out of jealouſy (57). Here follows the ſtory of his third paſſion. " He reſolved to end " and crown his works by the ſonnets of Helen, " whoſe virtues, beauties, and rare perfections were " the laſt and moſt worthy object of his muſe: the " laſt

(54) Binet, p. 129.

(55) This was therefore in 1544. Nevertheleſs Binet had juſt before ſaid, that Ronſard had publiſhed an Epithalamium on the marriage of Monſ. de Vendome, with Jane d'Albert, Queen of Navarre; and afterwards writ two poems before he fell in love with Caſſandra. This marriage was ſolemnized in 1548. In the Life of Ronſard, in the Collection of the fineſt Pieces of the French Poets, printed in 1692, it is affirmed that he fell in love with Caſſandra at Blois, when he was in the Duke of Anjou's family. But there was no Duke of Anjou at that time.

(56) Theſe words are from Theocritus, which Virgil, Eclogue 8, tranſlates as follows, ut vidi ut perii, i. e. " I was " wounded by " the firſt " glance."

(57) Binet, p. 133.

theſe verſes had not produced him any emolument [I]: but that the reward was beſtowed on others. But he was not ſo unſucceſsful with regard to thoſe poetical pieces which he addreſſed to Charles IX. he being paid pretty liberally for them [K]. He commenced a ſuit againſt Joachim du Bellai, to recover ſome odes that had been artfully ſtole

" laſt, becauſe he had not the good fortune to ſee her " but in his old age; and the moſt worthy, becauſe " this Lady, by her quality, virtue, and fame, excelled " the former ſubjects of his juvenile paſſion We may " naturally ſuppoſe that he loved the two firſt with " greater familiarity; he rather honouring and " praiſing this Lady, than courting her. This ap- " pears from the title he gave to his encomiums, in " which he imitated Petrarch, who being one day " applauded before the Queen-mother, for the chaſt- " neſs and modeſty of his muſe, her Majeſty ad- " viſed him to write in the ſame ſtrain, as more " ſuitable to his age, and the gravity of his learning. " In this manner Ronſard imagining he had an op- " portunity of devoting his muſe to an excellent per- " ſon, he looked upon the Queen's permiſſion as " leave, or rather a command to addreſs himſelf to " ſo excellent a perſon, who was one of her maids " of honour, of a very ancient and noble family in " Saintonge. He continued to praiſe her till his " death; and end, as it were, his life in applaud- " ing her. And becauſe her wit gave him fre- " quent opportunities of exerciſing his pen, he con- " ſecrated to her memory a fountain or ſpring in " Vandoſmois, which ſtill goes by her name (58)."

(58) Binet, Vie de Ronſard, p. 142, 143.

In the collection of the moſt beautiful pieces of the French Poets, ancient and modern, printed at Paris in 1692, is a life of Ronſard, wherein I met with an error, which it may be proper to correct in this place. *He celebrated the fame of Helen de Sugeres, who was one of the Queen's maids of honour; and deſired Cardinal du Perron to write a Preface for this collection of Love Poems, in which he beſought him to declare, that he had entertained a virtuous paſſion for that young Lady. The Cardinal anſwered, that inſtead of a Preface, he need only put Helen de Sugeres's picture * in the front of his book* (59). As du Perron was young when Ronſard died, ſo great a Poet as he was would not have deſired him to favour him with a Preface. The truth is, he did not requeſt ſuch a favour of any perſon; the Lady herſelf deſiring Cardinal du Perron to draw up ſuch a Preface. If the reader looks in the Perroniana, he will find the following paſſage under the word GOURNAY (60): This I one day ſaid to Mademoiſelle de Surgeres, who deſired me, at Mr. de Rets's, to prefix a letter to Ronſard's works, to inform the world that he had not an unchaſte paſſion for her. Inſtead of ſuch a letter, ſays I, we need but inſert your picture.

* Becauſe ſhe was ugly.

(59) Recueil, des plus belles Pieces, Tom. 1. p. 241, 242. Dutch edit.

(60) See rem. [B] of the art. GOURNAI.

[I] It uſed to give him uneaſineſs, when he remembered that thoſe verſes had not produced him any emolument.] I ſhall prove this by a paſſage from Claudius Binet (61). " He has often told me, that one of his love " verſes and interludes have been invented and writ- " ten at the requeſt of a perſon of diſtinction; " meaning that he had often forced his genius, and " not found great pleaſure on thoſe occaſions, other " perſons having run away with the reward; for " which reaſon he put under thoſe pieces the verſes " of Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, &c. It is known for " whom he wrote the amours of Callyrea, who was " a moſt beautiful Lady of the Court, of the noble " family of Atry (62), ſirnamed Aquaviva, as he " explains it ſufficiently in the ſonnet which begins " thus, La belle eau vive, (the beautiful running " ſtream). It is likewiſe known for whom he " wrote theſe verſes on Aſtrea (63), who alſo was a " handſom Lady of the Court, whoſe name is greatly " embelliſhed, by the changing of a vowel." We may infer from theſe words, that this great Poet was not ſo much diſintereſted as a man of honour ought to be. It would have redounded greatly to his reputation, had he ſhewn a greater averſeneſs to that mercenary temper, ſo common among the friends of the muſes; and I am ſurpriſed Binet ſhould have been ſo ingenuous, to inform us of the complaints made by Ronſard, upon his not being recompenſed. Be this as it will, we here have a proof, that a man may write amorous verſes, without being in love with the perſon who is the ſubject of them. It is my opinion that this is an eaſier taſk when ſuch a perſon has a miſtreſs of his own (64).

(61) Binet, Vie de Ronſard, p. 141, 142.

(62) I ſpoke of this Lady, at the cloſe of the text of the art. JACCETIUS.

(63) She was a Lady of the D'Eſtrée family.

[K] He being paid pretty liberally for . . . thoſe poetical pieces, which he addreſſed to Charles IX.] This Prince, " beſides his ordinary penſion, made him " ſome preſents. He indeed uſed to ſay frequently, " in a jeſting way, he was afraid of loſing his Ron- " ſard; and leſt too great affluence ſhould make " his muſe grow lazy; and that a good Poet ought " not to be fattened too much any more than a good " horſe; that he ſhould be kept in good plight, but " not fattened. Nevertheleſs he was always very " generous to him; he knowing that Poets have I " know not what ſympathy with the greatneſs of " Kings, and are very apt to take fire; ſtrongly af- " fected when they are not rewarded according to " their merit, and the pains they may have taken, " as he himſelf complained in ſeveral places (65)." The laſt part of this paſſage confirms what has been ſeen above (66) with regard to our Ronſard's mercenary temper, for which reaſon I have not ſuppreſſed it, as I ſhould otherwiſe have done. It is to be obſerved that Brantome ſpeaks of this policy of Charles IX. (α), as may have been ſeen in the article DAURAT (67). This is the moſt certain way of keeping Poets buſy; for were they to be very rich, they poſſibly might deſpiſe their profeſſion. We therefore may conclude, that Charles IX. had reaſon to behave as if the Poets had offered up the ſame prayer to him as Agur did to God, Give me neither poverty nor riches, feed me with food convenient for me (68). The medium he obſerved is perhaps the greateſt bleſſing that could be wiſhed for the Commonwealth of Letters; for ſome Authors, had they been very rich, would not have publiſhed the fine works, with which they have favoured the publick; and others would have given their compoſitions in greater perfection, had they been in better circumſtances. It is the too great indigence of ſome Authors, that has given occaſion to the vaſt multitude of bad books, with which the world has been peſtered. Had they poſſeſſed a decent competency, this would have given them an opportunity to poliſh, with ſome patience, their works; but the very urgent wants of a man, who has a large family, and is dunned by a creditor whom he puts off till the time he may have gathered the fruit of a dedication, and been paid for his copy, forces him to go with poſt haſte; and will not allow him time to lick his cubs, before he exhibits them to the publick. I will obſerve, that there are ſome ſuch works, which it is better to have, than be entirely deprived of them. It was of greater advantage, for inſtance, to the publick, to have poſſeſſed du Ryer's tranſlations, than not to have had any of the Authors tranſlated by him: and therefore, in caſe that worthy man would have led an idle life, had he been very rich, it were better he had had but juſt ſufficient to maintain him, than to have abounded. See what Eraſmus ſays with regard to Sigiſmund GELENIUS (69). A Writer, who propoſes to raiſe himſelf in the world, exerts his utmoſt endeavours to write well; but the inſtant he has obtained what he ſought, he grows negligent. This is obſerved with reſpect to preachers; theſe always preach better, before they have obtained an Epiſcopal See they have in view, than after they are made Biſhops (70). This puts me in mind of a very ingenious repartee, as it has been thought. A great Prince of this age, intending to beſiege a certain city, heard that it would be defended by a Marſhal of France, and did not change his reſolution on that account: but it is affirmed that he made this reply to thoſe who would have repreſented to him the conſequences of that circumſtance; a Governor, who is not yet raiſed to the poſt of Marſhal of France, is more to be dreaded than a Governor who is ſo already.

(64) It is only figuring to one's ſelf, that the Lady one is deſired to write upon, is our own miſtreſs.

(65) Binet, p. 143.

(66) In the preceding rem.

(67) Citat. 21.

(68) Proverbs of Solomon, chap. xxx. ver. 8.

(69) Citat. 10. of his art.

(70) Vide rem. [C] of the art. ZEUXIS.

§ (α) Theſe

ſtole from him [L]; but they afterwards were reconciled, and lived as good friends. He would have writ amorous verſes with greater beauty, had he not taken the ancient Poets for his model; he being harſh and obſcure, by having recourſe too frequently to their fables [M]. He even ſometimes took the ſame liberties they did, of introducing ſome obſcene expreſſions in his works [N]; and in general, he introduced ſeveral profane ſtrokes, and too many heathen touches in his Poems, which nevertheleſs were paid with ſacred things [O]. People are greatly divided with reſpect to the merit of his performances

§ (a) Theſe words of Brantome are extracted from Papirius Maſſo's life of Charles IX. reprinted at the end of the additions to Memoires de Caſtelnau: Poetas generoſis equis ſimiles eſſe dicens, quos nutrire, non ſaginari oportet. REM. CRIT.

[L] He commenced a ſuit againſt Joachim du Bellai, to recover ſome odes that had been artfully ſtole from him.] This is a very whimſical kind of law-ſuit. I do not doubt but that Ronſard proſecuted it with as much warmth, as others would do to recover an inheritance left them by their fathers. The writer of his life touches very gently on this ſubject, he being afraid to injure the reputation, either of the plaintiff, or defendant, The latter made a moſt odious figure before the Judges, and the former made them a little merry. But it may be proper to give the whole paſſage in Claudius Binet. "When there was a great "talk of the loves of Caſſandra, and of four books "of Odes, in imitation of thoſe of Pindar and "Horace, which Ronſard had promiſed to publiſh, "as wits are often jealous of one another; du Bellay, who likewiſe had celebrated his Oliva in an "amorous ſtrain, was deſirous of writing ſome odes "on the plan and deſign of thoſe of Ronſard, "which he found means to procure without the Author's privity. He accordingly wrote ſome, which, "together with ſome ſonnets, he privately ſent to "preſs, in order to publiſh them, and by that means "be before hand in reputation with Ronſard. Theſe "were publiſhed and entitled a Collection of Poems, "which conduct raiſed a natural jealouſy, if not envy, in Ronſard againſt du Bellay; inſomuch that "he commenced a ſuit againſt him for the recovery "of his manuſcripts. The Court decreeing that "they ſhould be given to him, they not only laid "their animoſity aſide, but Ronſard exciting du Bellay to go on with his odes, they became greater "friends than ever; concluding that ſuch a little ambition is very frequent in generous ſouls; and that "as perſons who are fond of glory are eaſily fired, "they are as ſpeedily reconciled (71)."

(71) Binet, p. 129, 130.

COMMENTARIES made on Ronſard.

[M] He being harſh and obſcure, by having recourſe too frequently to their fables.] This was complained of in his time, for which reaſon the lovers of his poems wrote commentaries on them. The amours of Caſſandra were commented on by Muretus. Remi Belleau and Nicholas Richelet wrote a commentary on his paſſion for Mary: the firſt book by Remi Belleau, and the ſecond by Nicholas Richelet: Richelet alſo commented his ſonnets in praiſe of Helen, the five books of his odes, and his hymns. All the pieces in the IXth part of his works have had the ſame honour done them by Claudius Garnier. Peter de Marcaſſus, beſides ſeveral pieces of the firſt part, has commented the Franciad, which makes the third; le Rocage royal, which makes the fourth; the eclogues, Maſcarades, and Cartels, which form the fifth; the elegies which form the ſixth; and the poems which make the eighth (72). John Beſſi, the King's Attorney at Fontenai le Comte, wrote a commentary on the hymns (73). Poor Ronſard has been ſtrongly attacked in le Parnaſſe Réformé, where his writings are ſaid to be impenetrably obſcure without the aid of a good commentary. The following poem is particularly objected to him.

(72) Baillet, Jugem. ſur Poetes, num. 1335.

(73) Colomies, Obſervat. Sacræ, p. 54.

Je ne ſuis point ma guerriere Caſſandre, &c.

"Martial Caſſandra's not by me purſued."

(74) Parnaſſe Reformé, p. 91, 92. Dutch edit.

Do you really imagine, ſays the Author (74), that your Caſſandra, in whoſe applauſe you wrote that Sonnet, had ſo good an opinion of it? Can we ſuppoſe that ſhe knew this brother whom you aſcribe to her; Do you imagine that le Dolope ſoudart, le Myrmidon, le Coreb inſenſé, and le Gregeois Penelée, were names ſhe eaſily underſtood; and muſt it be an eaſy taſk for a young Lady to be obliged to explain all the fables of the ſiege of Troy?

Ronſard's harſhneſs and obſcurity would be more excuſable, had he been the firſt who improved the French poetry; but he might, if he had pleaſed, have ſeen it in all its charms and natural beauties, and very near perfection in Marot's writings. What great help might theſe have been to him? Here follows la Bruyere's opinion. "Marot's turn and ſtyle of "his compoſitions is ſuch, that he ſeems to have "wrote after RONSARD: there is hardly any difference, except in a few words, between Marot and "us. Ronſard, and the Authors his contemporaries, "did more diſſervice than good to ſtyle; they checked its courſe in the advances it was making towards perfection, and had like to have prevented "its ever attaining it. It is ſurprizing that MAROT, "whoſe works are ſo eaſy and natural, did not "make Ronſard, who was fired with the ſtrong enthuſiaſm of poetry, a greater Poet than either "RONSARD and MAROT (75)." But how was it poſſible that the works of the latter ſhould produce ſo happy an effect on a man, who had ſo little taſte, that he conſidered them only as a heap of dirt with ſome grains of gold in it? He was for ever reading, as we are told by the Author of his life (76), ſome French Poet, . . . and particularly . . . John le Maire de Belges, the Romance of the Roſe, and Marot's works, which he afterwards called, as we are told Virgil ſaid of thoſe of Ennius, the dunghill, from which he drew, by induſtrious waſhing, rich grains of gold. La Bruyere would not have looked upon this waſhing as very induſtrious; he would have ſaid, that Ronſard took the earth, and threw away the gold.

(75) La Bruyere, Caracteres, in the chapter des Ouvrages de l'Eſprit, p. m. 82.

(76) Binet, p. m. 121.

[N] Some obſcene expreſſions in his works.] I will quote but one inſtance of this mentioned by Menage, in that part where he reproaches him with employing obſcene fable. We ought, ſays he (77), to employ ſuch fables only as are univerſally known. Ronſard, by making uſe of ſome which are known only to the learned, and found no where but in the ſcholiaſts, as that taken notice of in the following verſes of Ode XXI, Book II, and which he borrowed from the Scholiaſt on Nicander,

(77) Menage, Obſervat. ſur Malherbe, p. 531.

Ny les fleurons que diffama
Venus, alors que ſa main blanche
Au milieu du Lis renferma
D'un grand Aſne le roide manche, inſtead of acquiring the fame and reputation, as a ſcholar, has been conſidered as a pedant. Here follows Nicholas Richelet's note on theſe four verſes of Ronſard. "We read this in Nicander's Alexipharmaca. One "cannot comprehend how this can be underſtood of "the lily, which Nicander, in another place, calls "the delight of Venus. And indeed our author "ſeems to entertain ſome doubt of this himſelf, ſince "he again ſpeaks of the lily in that ode, and it "would be ſuperfluous to ſpeak twice of the ſame "flower. Now Nicander ſays, that this flower, whatever it was, was one day ſo bold as to contend "for beauty with Venus, who out of ſpite, and "to revenge herſelf, ſtuck an aſſe's yard into the "middle of its leaves.

"——Τότ' ἀπίσυγεν, ἀφρὼ
"Οινεκ' ἐριδμαίνεσκε χροῒς ὕπερ, ἐν δὲ νυθρίοις
"Αργαλέην μεσάτοισιν ὀτειδίην ἐπέλασσε
"Δεινὴν βρωμήεντ' ἐναλθήσασα κορύνην (78)."

(78) Richelet, ſur le 2 Livre des Odes de Ronſard, p. m. 306.

This Commentator does not complain of the obſcurity of the text.

[O] Which nevertheleſs were paid with ſacred things.] See Sorel, who ſays that "Ronſard's Odes, written in "praiſe of ſome perſons, are an imitation of Pindar; and mances, as appears from Baillet (b). See alſo Sorel's remarks on le Berger Extravagant (c): in which many curious and juſt criticiſms are made on this Poet.

(b) Baillet, Jugemens ſur les poetes, num. 1335.

(c) On book 13. p. 647 & ſeq.

I muſt not omit, that it has been obſerved he was not ſucceſsful in correcting his Poems [P], he eraſing the beſt things in them. This is a very troubleſome imperfection, and which

" and that the reſt, which are but indifferent, are moſtly borrowed from Anacreon, ſo that we ſcarce meet with any reflections but the following; perhaps we to-morrow may be nothing but duſt; that we ought to make the moſt we can of life, and devote our time either to wine or women; which, to me, ſeem the precepts of a man who did not believe in the immortality of the ſoul. Nor do his hymns inculcate much more the precepts of virtue: ſome of them are only ſo many repetitions of what we meet with in Homer and the reſt of the Poets, as the hymns of Calais and Zethes, and of Caſtor and Pollux, which is not very proper; there being no occaſion to ſing praiſes to thoſe imaginary perſonages. As to the hymn of Hercules compared to Chriſt, both in his birth and labours, this cannot inſpire the leaſt devotion; for ſuch foreign applications prompt one to laugh, rather than repent of our faults (79)." After giving the ſubſtance of the hymn, he adds: " I would chooſe to baniſh the heathen fables, rather than to think of rectifying them, by applying them in ſuch a manner to ſacred myſteries. It is dangerous to let Poets work upon theſe ſubjects. It is plain that ſhould we dive a little into matters, the myſteries of our Religion would be profaned, the relations being only in the ſuperficies or outſide. How infamous is it to refer the adultery of Jupiter to the Incarnation of the eternal Word? One muſt alſo ſay that the Virgin is repreſented by Alcmena; and then the angel Gabriel who declared the conception, and the Holy Ghoſt who operated on that occaſion, Mercury muſt repreſent this. Wretched Poet! before you explain in this manner the whole fable of Hercules, conſider what you are about; there being ſuch abominable ideas couched under it, that my pen drops from my hand at the bare reflection on them. You will anſwer that you have not treated about it; but if a reader has ever ſo little penetration, will he not be deſirous of ſeeing the ſeveral relations of their fables; and then, is not the compariſon between Hercules and Chriſt ſhameful in all reſpects (80)?" I muſt obſerve that he excuſes our poet a little. " I alſo have ſeen ſome moral reflections on the Romance of the roſe, where the moſt laſcivious touches in it were explained for our creation, redemption, and eternal life; but there are alſo ſome execrable ideas there, which, however, I believe the Author introduced innocently, and agreeably to the ſimplicity of the age in which he lived. I indeed do not doubt but that Ronſard's intention was very good in his Chriſtian Hercules; but his performance did not anſwer his expectation. With regard to his other hymns, in thoſe on eternity, juſtice, the devils, and ſuch like, he introduces ſeveral deities, which he ſhould have left to the Greeks (81)." In criticiſing the hymns on the four ſeaſons, this Poet's maſter-piece, according to the Author of his funeral oration (82), and Paſquier (83), he points at a greater number of falſities, and even a groſs contradiction. Though fictions are voluntary and depend on the fancy, nevertheleſs a Poet muſt not have two different opinions in the ſame work; and yet, in a following hymn which ought to be dependent on the firſt, ſince the four are connected, Ronſard ſays, that nature ſeeing it was to no purpoſe ſhe laid her hand on her huſband's (time) belly, and intwined her leg with his, tickling his fleſh at the ſame time; he not being any longer fit for the amorous congreſs, ſhe fell in love with the ſun, and lay with him, and had by him the four ſeaſons. Here we have another birth (84). Had he not great reaſon to condemn ſuch indecent inventions? Should he have pardoned him for ſaying, to his Helen, that ſhe muſt not forget, on Aſh-wedneſday, to come and take ſome aſhes from his heart, which the fire of love had burnt (85)? Had he not juſt reaſon to condemn ſeveral other profane touches of our Poets, and the rewards which were beſtowed upon them.

(79) Sorel, Remarques ſur le 13 Livre du Berger extravagant, p. 648.

(80) Ibid. p. 650.

(81) Ibid. p. 652.

(82) Thoſe who have ſeen the hymns on the four ſeaſons, which I believe moſt in this aſſembly have had the curioſity to do, will confirm my opinion pretty well; and affirm, that it is ſcarce poſſible to caſt one's eyes upon them, without being charmed with them; and without confeſſing, that there muſt neceſſarily be ſome ſoul, ſome genius therein, which animates and tranſports either the Readers or Auditors. Du Perron, Oraiſon funebre de Ronſard, p. 198, 199.

(63) Paſquier, Recherches, liv. 7. ch. 11. p. 646.

(84) Sorel, Remarques ſur le 13 Livre du Berger extravagant, p. 653, 654. He had before mentioned another of Ronſard's fictions with regard to the birth of the four ſeaſons.

(85) Ibid. Remarques ſur le 14 Livre, p. 733.

" The worſt circumſtance, ſays he (86) is, that no " perſons have wrote ſo looſely in this age, on theſe " matters, as the Clergy; as though it were more " lawful for them to ſport with ſacred things, be" cauſe they have the diſpoſal of them. They were " conſidered as men, who were not ſo much the paſ" tors of the people as of their own belly, to feed " which was their only care; and as they were heard " to ſpeak profanely, the laity had the boldneſs to " do as much, a circumſtance that proved very preju" dicial to Religion. I am acquainted with ſeveral " others, who have not yet any Church preferment, " but are deſirous of obtaining ſome, though they " have no other merit than the being authors of lewd " and impious pieces. Theſe are Court-flies, who " hum about the palaces of Princes, and are inceſ" ſantly importuning them; it being thought, that " the beſt reward which can be given to Poets, is " the beſtowing benefices on them. A moſt abomi" nable cuſtom! to beſtow the revenues of the Church " on perſons, who are recompenſed only for having " been pimps to their maſters, as is manifeſt from " their love-verſes, made to foment the diſorderly " paſſions of Princes and Kings. St. Gelais indeed " was a Biſhop Deſportes an Abbot, and Ron" ſard had a benefice (87); that he even intreat" ed the King to add a croſier to his lyre; as tho' " the juſt reward of his different poems would have " been a Biſhop's See, which ought to be beſtowed " only on a man whoſe words and works are holy. " However, I will not preſume to blame all theſe " writers on that account; it being piouſly my opi" nion, that their looſe poems were wrote in their " youth; and that they ſince repented of what they " had done, and thereby made themſelves worthy of " the preferment they were raiſed to."

(86) Ibid. p. 738, 739, 740.

(87) He was Prior of Croix-val and St. Coſmus.

The laſt part of this paſſage agrees, with reſpect to our Poet, with what Baillet ſays of him. " It is " doing a good office to Ronſard's memory, to in" form the public that he condemned, in his later " years, the immoral and lewd verſes, which he had " wrote in the heat of his paſſion. He had even " begun to reform his muſe; and had formed a " reſolution to write nothing but Chriſtian poetry " during the remainder of his days. Not ſatisfied to " take care of his conſcience, with regard to the " world to come, he thought alſo of expiating for " what he had done, by ſuppreſſing ſeveral entire " compoſitions of his youth; and ſtriking out all " ſuch paſſages not approved by him in his perform" ances, the whole of which was not quite vicious. " But we may ſay, that he behaved on this occaſion, " rather like a father who cannot diveſt himſelf of " the tenderneſs he had for his children, than as an " incorruptible judge (88)." Againſt this Menage (89) oppoſes the following words of Binet to this: Perſiſting in the reſolution to love and addreſs one of the Queen's maids of honour, to the laſt, he ended, as it were, his life in applauding her (90). Thuanus obſerves, that Ronſard wrote ſome pious verſes, and well enough turned, in his expiring moments (91). I have read in Brantome, that Chatellard, a French Gentleman, who was beheaded in Scotland for entertaining a paſſion for the Queen, and, what is more, made an attempt againſt that Princeſs's honour, had no other viaticum and preparation for death, but a poem of Ronſard; an evident proof that he conſidered it as a very pious piece. Being brought, the day appointed for the execution, on the ſcaffold, he took up Mr. Ronſard's hymns; and, for his eternal conſolation, read the whole hymn on death; this being a fine hymn, and proper to leſſen the fear of death; he not having any other ſpiritual book, Miniſter or Confeſſor (92).

(88) Baillet, Jugem. ſur le Poetes, num. 1335.

(89) Anti-Baillet, chap. 145.

(90) Claude Binet, Vie de Ronſard, p. 143.

(91) Etiam dum animam ageret aliquot piis verſibus non pœnitendis factis, qui poſtea cum cæteris ejus operibus editi ſunt. Thuan. lib. 83. ſub fin.

(92) Brantome, Memoirs des Dames illuſtres, p. m. 173.

[P] He was not ſucceſsful in correcting his poems.] The following long note of Menage (93) will prove a very inſtructive commentary. " The ſecond thoughts " of Poets are often not ſo good as the firſt, as Binet " has obſerved very judiciouſly (94) with regard to " Ronſard's verſes. Some, ſays he, think that ſome of the places

(93) Menage, Obſervat. ſur Malherbe, p. 385, 386.

(94) In Ronſard's Life, p. m. 169.

which ſome other writers unhappily fall into. I muſt alſo obſerve, that the common place for this jeſt, viz. that Poets have poor habitations has been employed with regard to Ronſard [Q]. [" Bayle is of opinion that Ronſard was born the 11th of September " 1524, but I am perſuaded he ſhould have ſaid 1526. In the firſt place, Ronſard " himſelf, quoted by Bayle at the cloſe of the remark [B], ſays that he was not paſt " thirty ſeven years in the ſpring of anno 1563, and conſequently he was not born till " after the ſpring of 1526. Secondly, James Veillard of Chartres, Ronſard's friend, " wrote, at the ſame time with Binet and du Perron, two elogiums of Ronſard in Latin, " which were printed the 1ſt of February 1586, and entitled, P. Ronſardi Poetæ Gallici " Laudatio funebris. He there ſays, page 10. that Lewis de Ronſard was ſent into " Spain, to convey the two ſons of Francis I. who in conſequence of the treaty concluded " at Madrid the 14th of January 1526, were to continue as hoſtages in that city for their " father. He adds, that Peter de Ronſard was not born till after his father Lewis de " Ronſard was returned from his journey above-mentioned into Spain. Lodoicus Ron- " ſardus regiam prolem . . . . in Hiſpaniam comitatus . . . . pro tot meritis, inde reverſus, " ornatus fuit à Rege ampliſſimis muneribus, auctus autem à Deo hoc Petro Ronſardo. " Thirdly, Scævola Sammarthanus, quoted by Bayle, ſays that Ronſard (his friend) " did not live to above threeſcore years of age, which proves that he was born but in 1526. " The

" places he has corrected in his works, not ſo agreeable " as his firſt conceptions. For it happens, particularly in " poetry, that the firſt fury is more natural; and that " the too frequent applying of the file, inſtead of bright- " ning and poliſhing, only wears away and ſpoils the tem- " per of the metal." Paſquier, in his Recherches, makes the ſame obſervation. " Ronſard, ſays he (95) Lib. 7. ch. 7. p. m. 623. " (95), was a great Poet, but a very bad critick with " regard to his own works. For two or three years be- " fore his death, being weakened through age, afflicted " with the gout, and tortured with perpetual uneaſineſs " and ſickneſs, his poetical vein, which till then had " been a charming companion to him, having almoſt for- " ſaken him, he printed all his poems in a large volume, " the general order of which he changed; ſuppreſſed many " ſmart and fine pieces invented by him, quite changed " ſome entire verſes, and in ſome introduced other words, " which are far from being ſo ſtrong as the firſt; by " this means he deſtroyed the beauty which was in many " of them; he not conſidering, that though they were his " offspring, and conſequently that he might have all au- " thority over them, it yet did not become peeviſh old " age to judge of the flights of vigorous youth. But " nothing proves this aſſertion ſo well, as the exam- " ple of Taſſo, who changed his Gieruſalemme for " the worſe." Taſſo has long been reproached with this. I have a book entitled, Il duello dell' ignoranza, e della ſcienza, (The combat between ignorance and knowledge) printed at Milan in 1607; and I there- in find, that this great Poet is blamed for ſuppreſſing ſeveral beautiful paſſages, in his Gieruſalemme conqui- ſtata, and ſubſtituting other ridiculous ones in their ſtead. The Author points out ſome of theſe places, after which he ſpeaks thus: a' quali tutti gratiſſimi, e giocondiſſimi auvenimenti ſuſtituiſce il Taſſo coſe tali, che ſe con ſemplice intelligenza debbono prenderſi, ſono ſi frivole, che niente più, e ſe ci è dentro qualche miſtero, egli ci è involto con tante ambagi, ch'à ſottrarnelo non baſterebbe l'iſteſſo edippo (96). i. e. " Taſſo, inſtead (96) Duello dell' Ignor. & della Scienza, lib. 4. cap. 3. p. 183. " of thoſe moſt delightful incidents, publiſhed ſuch " things, that if we are to underſtand them literal- " ly, nothing can be more trifling; but if they in- " clude ſome myſtery, it is wrapped up in ſuch deep " obſcurity, that Oedipus himſelf would not be able " to diſcover the meaning of them." The Author from whom I tranſcribed this paſſage is entitled, Don Conſtantino de' Notari Nolano della Congregatione Caſſinenſe. I have taken notice elſewhere (97) of the faults, which authors may fall into, by correcting their works too much. (97) See rem. [F]. of the art. LINACRE.

[Q] The common place for this jeſt, viz. that Poets have poor habitations, has been employed againſt Ronſard.] His condition, in this reſpect, was worſe than that of lodging in a garret, it being ſaid, that he was placed like a great lanthorn at the top of a tower; or like centinels who watch all night to prevent a houſe from taking fire. It is added, that there ſtill remains a monument of his ſad habitation; the tower in which he lived ſtill going by his name. Ronſard doubtleſs did not expect this. Poets do not care to be immortalized by ſuch incidents; and would be very ſorry, could the following thought of Horace be juſtly applied to them.

Exegi monumentum ære perennius
Regalique ſitu pyramidum altius (98). (98) Horat. Od. 30. lib. 3.

" —— I have rais'd a monument
" More ſtrong than braſs, and of a vaſt extent:
" Higher than Egypt's ſtatelieſt pyramid,
" That coſtly monument of kingly pride."

CREECH.

The teſtimony I am to produce ſays as follows. Ron- ſard, who, we are told, did not dare to attack Rabelais, when living, in writing, though they frequently uſed to wrangle at Meadon, in the palace of the Princes of the Lorrain family, attacked him only in an epitaph, in which he ſpeaks very injuriouſly of him, becauſe Ra- belais conſidered him only as a poor, penyleſs Poet, in- ſomuch that he thought himſelf very happy to lodge in a watch tower, ſtill called Ronſard's tower, in Meudon, whence he uſed to go and pay his court at the caſtle, and where he uſed often to meet Rabelais, who never ſpared him. After all, if he was not ſo famous a Poet as Ronſard, he yet was born a Poet as well as Phy- ſician; being infinitely more learned than that Prince of Poets of his age, and had a much better talent at raillery* (99). The book whence theſe words are ex- tracted was printed at Paris in 1697. The author did not put his name to it; but he diſcovered him- ſelf enough in his dedication (100). Though he had practiſed Phyſic fifty years, he yet was poor. His ill fortune had given his mind a ſatyrical turn; and he, at laſt, ſpent all his leiſure in criticiſing others. This appears from his ſupplement to the hiſtory of Phyſic, from his Anti-Menagiana; and the little book he publiſhed under the fictitious name of Pepinacourt, and entitled Réflexions, Penſées, & Bons- mots anecdotes. He died at Paris the 18 of May 1698. [" Many perſons are miſtaken in aſſerting that Ron- " ſard in ſeeing du Bartas's work of the creation, or " firſt week, was ſo ſtruck with admiration, and con- " ceived ſo great an eſteem for it, as Baillet ſays, art. " 1339, ſpeaking of du Bartas, that he made that " Poet a preſent of a golden pen, confeſſing that he " had done more in a week, than himſelf (Ronſard) " had made in all his life. Nevertheleſs this ſtory " has been adopted by the learned. Baillet extracted " it from Teiſſier's additions to Thuanus's account " of learned men, in the article du Bartas. Teiſſier " does not ſay where he had that ſtory, which, on " his bare teſtimony, ſeconded by Baillet, has paſſed " in moſt of the editions of Moreri, and even in " that of 1725, in Mr. de la Croix's Art of Poetry, " pag. 366. printed in 1694; in the Hiſtory of the " French Poetry, by Abbé Merveſin, p. 292. printed " in 1706. I do not know where Teiſſier borrowed " the

* Ex utroque Apollo.

(99) Jugement & nouvelles Obſervations ſur les Oeuvres de Rabelais, p. 52, 53.

(100) John Bernier, born in Blois, was the Author.

" The only circumſtance that can be objected to all this is, that Ronſard ſays, in his " verſes to Remi Belleau, that he was born the ſame year that Francis I. was taken pri- " ſoner. Now this is but a random date; and he might have ſuppoſed that this Prince had " been taken priſoner, and ſet at liberty the ſame year. Generally ſpeaking, when a man " ſays, I am not yet ſo old, he is ſuppoſed to be more certain of what he declares, than " when he ſays, I was born the ſame year when ſuch an incident happened. Nothing indeed " may more eaſily happen, than to forget or be ignorant of the exact year, in which an " incident, though otherwiſe very remarkable, happened * †."]

* From the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 983. col. 2.

† See rem. [B] of this art.

" the particular relating to the golden pen, nor re- " member any Author who mentioned it before him. " The other part of the ſtory is found in Goulart, " cited by Mr. de la Monnoye, in article 1339 of " Baillet, in Colletet, &c. I fancy that it was the " Calviniſts, who, even in Ronſard's life time, ſpread " a report, that he had reſigned the poetical ſceptre " to du Bartas, after having read his week. But " Ronſard being informed of this, ſtrongly denied " the truth of theſe falſe Newſmongers of Parnaſſus. " This was in a pretty ſharp ſonnet, addreſſed to " John d'Aurat (Dorat) his maſter, and is as follows:

Ils ont menti, d'Aurat, ceux qui le veulept dire,
Que Ronſard, don la Muſe à contenté les Rois,
Soit moins que le Bartas, & qu'il ait par ſa voix
RENDU CE TEMOIGNAGE ennemi de ſa Lyre.
Ils ont menti, d'Aurat, ſi bas je ne reſpire:
Je ſçay trop qui je ſuis; et mille & mille fois
Mille & mille tourmens pluſtot je ſoufrirois
QU'UN AVEU SI CONTRAIRE au nom que je deſire, &c.

" D'Aurat, they lie, who ſay that known Ron- " ſard,
" Whoſe fruitful muſe has oft delighted Kings,
" Stoops to du Bartas; and that Ronſard him- " ſelf,
" Confeſs'd what ſurely wou'd diſgrace his Lyre.
" D'Aurat, they lie, if there be faith in man.
" I know myſelf too well: and I wou'd ſuffer
" Unheard of tortures, rather than ſubmit
" To what would caſt eternal odium on me."

This ſonnet is in page 1601, of Ronſard's works, of the Paris edition, in two volumes folio in 1623. It is followed by ten verſes more, addreſſed to Scævola Sammarthanus, in which Ronſard declares the contempt he had for du Bartas's Poems *."]

* From the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. vol. 4. p. 984. col. 1.

ROQUETAILLADE (a) (JOHN DE LA), in Latin De Rupeſciſſa, a Franciſcan Frier in the Convent of Aurillac (a), in the Convent of St. Flour, was very famous in the 14th Century, as well for the liberty he took to exclaim againſt the vices of the Clergy, and the oppreſſion of the people, and to vent menacing predictions [A], as for his long

(a) See the cloſe of the rem. [A], and citation (26).

(a) Rabelais, book 1. chap. 6. ſpeaks of one Roquetaillade, who, according to I know not what tradition, ſprung from his mother's heel. What does he mean by this? Rem. Crit.

[A] To exclaim againſt the vices of the Clergy ... and to vent menacing predictions.] I believe the beſt Commentary I can give upon theſe words will be to quote a long paſſage from Froiſſard. There was, in the city of Avignon, a Franciſcan Frier of great judgment and erudition, called Frier John de Roquetaillade, whom the Pope kept in the caſtle of Baignoux, becauſe of the wonderful things which he propheſied would come to paſs; and particularly of the evils which would befal the Prelates and Preſidents of holy Church, on account of their great luxury and pride; and alſo on the kingdom of France, and the great Lords of Chriſtendom, becauſe they ſo grievouſly oppreſſed the common people. And the ſaid Frier John attempted to prove his aſſertions, by the Revelations, and by the ancient books of the holy Prophets, which were opened to him by the grace of the Holy Ghoſt, ſo that he ſaid many things which it was difficult to believe. Some of them came to paſs in the time foretold by him, which he did not foretel as a Prophet, but as taken out of the ſacred writings, and by the grace of the Holy Ghoſt, which had given him underſtanding to declare all theſe antient prophecies, to proclaim to all Chriſtians the year and the time they ſhould come to paſs. He wrote, with great learning and knowledge, ſeveral books, one of which was compoſed in 1346, and therein told many marvellous things, difficult to be believed, ſeveral of which have come to paſs (1) ... In my young days, Pope Innocent reigning in Avignon, kept impriſoned a Franciſcan, a very learned man, named John de Roquetaillade. This Franciſcan, as he uſed to ſay, and as I have been informed, (in many places privately, but not in publick) had put forth, and continued to put forth, many prophecies of great and remarkable events, and particularly that were to happen, and accordingly have happened in his time, in the Kingdom of France; he ſpoke very clearly of the taking of King John; and ſhewed that the Church would ſtill ſuffer many hardſhips, becauſe of the great luxury of thoſe who had the government of it. And at the time I ſaw him in priſon, I was once told in the Pope's palace at Avignon, of an example he had given to the Cardinal of Oſtia, called otherwiſe of Arras, and to the Cardinal of Auxerre, who had been to ſee him, and reaſon with him about his words (2). This example is the apologue or fable related below (3). Why do not you read, continued he (4), the life of St. Sylveſter, &c. how the Emperor Conſtantine gave him the Church tithes, and on what condition: he did not uſe to ride up and down with two or three hundred horſes; but continued privately in Roma, and there led a life of ſobriety with his Clergy, &c. This Frier declared to them, that the change he propheſied in his apologue would ſoon come to paſs: Inſomuch, adds the Hiſtorian, that the Cardinals were often aſtoniſhed at it, and would gladly have ſentenced him to die, could they have found any juſt cauſe for it, which they could not. So they let him live as long as nature would let him, and did not dare to ſet him at liberty, leſt he ſhould lead mankind into error, by his profound predictions, drawn from the interpretations he himſelf gave of the ſcriptures. Nevertheleſs many things (as thoſe ſay who have taken greater notice of his predictions than I did) foretold by him, and which he wrote in priſon, and endeavoured to prove by the Revelations, have come to paſs. The true proofs, with which he armed himſelf, ſaved him ſeveral times from the flames; and beſides, ſome Cardinals took pity on him, and did not proſecute him with ſo much ſeverity as they might have done.

I ſhall make an obſervation on the diſtinction mentioned by Froiſſard. He ſays that this Franciſcan did not predict futurity as a Prophet, but only as a perſon whom the Holy Ghoſt had permitted to underſtand the prophecies. This is only a queſtion about a name, or a diſpute about words; and be this as it will, methinks this Frier's privilege equalled or ſurpaſſed that of the Prophets; for theſe did not always know what God intended to denote under images expreſſive of futurity; and conſequently a perſon to whom God reveals the true ſenſe of theſe prophetical ſigns receives a more peculiar favour. And therefore neither ſuch a man, nor his followers ought to ſcruple, upon pretence of modeſty, to call this favour a prophetical gift. If a man ſhould pretend to expound the Revelations of St. John, only by the aſſiſtance of the knowledge he might have attained by ſtudying the ſcriptures, that would be another thing; but when a perſon is perſuaded, that he underſtood the Revelations only by the aſſiſtance of the Holy Ghoſt; when, I ſay, a perſon addreſſes his readers as follows: I can affirm, that God in the way opened my eyes in ſuch a manner, as has given me inexpreſſible conſolation; for after having conſulted a hundred

(1) Froiſſard, vol. 1. ch. 211. quoted by Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 449.

(2) Ibid. vol. 3. chap. 24. cited ibid. p. 450.

(3) In the rem. [D].

(4) Froiſſard, quoted by Du Pleſſis, Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 450.

long impriſonment by way of puniſhment for his boldneſs [B]. Some relate that his predictions were juſtified by the event; but others affirm that the very contrary happened to what he had propheſied [C]. He did not properly boaſt of his being a Prophet, but that God had indulged him the ſecrets of the Revelations and the reſt of the Scripture prophecies.

times eternal truth, with the moſt profound humility, and the deepeſt attention, it at laſt anſwered (5); does not ſuch a one ſet himſelf up for a perſon raiſed in an extraordinary manner by Heaven, to predict futurity? is not this really calling one's ſelf a Prophet, or more than a Prophet? This is my firſt obſervation, and here follows the other. All Hiſtorians are not agreed that John de la Roquetaillade owned his not being a Prophet. Read the following paſſage from an Author who wrote the life of Innocent VI. Circa idem tempus, (that is anno 1356) inſurrexit quidam frater ordinis Minorum de conventu Aureliaci dioceſis ſancti Flori, dicens ſe habere SPIRITUM PROPHETIÆ, qui de futuris dicebat & in ſcriptis redigebat multa, vocatus frater Joannes de Rupeſciſſa qui quia potius vaticinator quam PROPHETA merito erat cenſendus, ad dictum Innocentium fuit adductus, &c. (6). i. e. "About the year 1356, "there aroſe a certain Franciſcan Frier, belonging "to the Convent of Aurillac, in the Dioceſe of St. "Flour, declaring himſelf to have a ſpirit of pro- "phecy, who ſpoke of things to come, and wrote "many things. This man was called Frier John "de Rupeſciſſa, (Roquetaillade) who, becauſe he was "to be looked upon as a Diviner, rather than a Pro- "phet, was brought before the ſaid Innocent, &c." It is certain our Franciſcan Frier declared very expreſsly in his writings, that he was not a Prophet. Read what I ſhall quote hereunder (7) from a Journaliſt.

[B] His long impriſonment by way of puniſhment for his boldneſs.] Froiſſard had juſt before informed us, that the Monk kept this Frier in priſon in the Caſtle of Bagnols. Another writer affirms, that about the year 1356, this pretended Prophet was ſent to Pope Innocent VI. who impriſoned him, and never ſuffered him to be releaſed (8). But this was not the firſt time of this Frier's being impriſoned; he being confined anno 1345 in the Convent of Figeac, by order of Frier William Farmena, Miniſter of the Franciſcans of the Provence of Aquitain, as appears from the beginning of the Revelations of this Prophet. We alſo find there, that he committed them to writing at the requeſt of Cardinal William Curti. His words ought to be cited. Ego frater Johannes de Rupeſciſſa ordinis fratrum Minorum provinciæ Aquitaniæ, provinciæ Ruthenenſis, & conventus Aurelhiaci, ad mandatum veſtrum deſcripſi ſeriem notabilium eventuum futurorum mihi in carceribus apertam, prout meliùs & veriùs potero recordari. Modus revelandi fuit iſte. Cùm anno Domini milleſimo trecenteſimo quadrageſimo quinto multis diebus flerem, vinctus ferro in carcere luti in conventu Figiaci ſtupens & mirans quare cum tanta crudelitate miſſus eſſem per fratrem Guillermum Farmena tunc miniſtrum Aquitaniæ in carcerem, &c. (9). i. e. "I "John Francis de Roquetaillade, a Franciſcan, of "the Province of Aquitain, in the Province of Rou- "ergue, and Convent of Aurillac, have com- "mitted to writing, at your command, a ſeries of "remarkable events that will come to paſs, (revealed "to me in priſon) which I have ſet down to the beſt "of my memory. The manner of the Revelation "was as follows. When in the year of our Lord one "thouſand three hundred and forty five, I had be- "wailed myſelf for many days, being bound in "chains in the priſon belonging to the Convent of "Figeac; aſtoniſhed and wondering why I ſhould "be ſo barbarouſly ſent thither by Frier William "Farmena, at that time Miniſter in Aquitain, &c." One would imagine it might be inferred from theſe words, that he did not begin to be favoured with the gift of Revelation till he was thrown into priſon; and this would naturally give one a curioſity to enquire the reaſon why his ſuperiors bound him in chains. Some relate that it was on account of his heretical principles; but the Writers who are the neareſt to that age ſay, that the only reaſon of his being ſent to priſon was, becauſe he pretended to foretel the near approach of Anti-chriſt; and aſſerted many particulars diſpleaſing to the Popes and ſovereign Princes; he declaring, that to their ambition, pride, and avarice, was owing all the calamities foretold by him (10). Alciatus ranks him among thoſe perſons, who had involved themſelves in great troubles, by a certain method employed by them to maintain and ſupport religion. Theſe give out prophecies; and this is the principal inſtrument they employ, in order to frighten thoſe perſons whom they could not prevail upon to ſerve God: Sunt & qui vaticinia ſe ſcire profiteantur, hocque potiſſimum modo, quos verbis ad cultum & pietatem inducere neſciunt, terrere conantur, quod merito Hercule in malam rem Johanni de Rupeſciſſa Symmiſtæ veſtro vertit. Cum enim ſe à Deo admonitum univerſalis judicii affirmaret, cumque mundi finem adeſſe conclamaret, quia dictis ejus res non reſponderunt, Avinione ab Urbano quinto captus in cuſtodia manſit (11). i. e. "There are ſome, who "pretend to be endued with the gift of prophecy; "and by this means principally, they endeavour to "frighten into religion and piety, thoſe whom "they cannot prevail upon by exhortations; which "indeed proved juſtly fatal to John de Roquetaillade, "your fellow-labourer in the miniſtry. For when "he declared aloud, that he was warned by Hea- "ven of the approach of the general Judgment, "and affirmed that the world would ſoon be at an "end; Pope Urban V. becauſe the event did not "happen according to his prediction, cauſed him to "be ſeized, and kept him in priſon." Alciatus has been guilty of an error in chronology on this occaſion, Roquetaillade being impriſoned by Pope Innocent VI. predeceſſor to Urban V.

[C] Some relate that his predictions were juſtified by the event; but others affirm, that the very contrary happened to what he had propheſied.] The reader has ſeen that Froiſſard declares, that ſeveral things foretold by this Franciſcan, came to paſs. The author of the life of Innocent VI does not deny this circumſtance; but he adds, that the predictions of our Frier had been falſe, whence he juſtly concludes that he was not a Prophet. Licet in dictis & ſcriptis ſuis reperta fuerint multa, quæ proceſſu temporis contigerunt, propter quæ plures ſibi fidem dabant, tamen etiam multa defuerunt, & ſic apparebat quia non erat verè Propheta, quia in illis, ſi talis fuiſſet, nullus fuiſſet defectus (12). i. e. "Al- "though many things ſpoke and written by him, "were juſtified, in proceſs of time, by the event, for "which reaſon ſeveral gave credit to him; yet many "did not come to paſs. This ſhewed evidently that "he was not a true Prophet; becauſe, had he been "ſuch, there would have been no defect in any of "his prophecies." I do not wonder at its being believed, that he had foretold the truth in ſeveral particulars; for firſt, thoſe who exclaim againſt public irregularities, and affirm that God will ſoon revenge an oppreſſed nation, will chaſtiſe avarice, luxury, and the pride of the great, coincide in that reſpect ſo well with the judgment of the multitude, that theſe take a pleaſure in aiding the prediction, and interpret, in its favour, every thing they ſee happen. Secondly, the world has, in all ages, been afflicted with ſuch great calamities, wars both inteſtine and foreign, with plagues, famine &c. that any perſons in any age, who ſhall propheſy fatal events, and dreadful chaſtiſements of God's wrath, will certainly hit upon the truth. But to ſilence at once all the partizans of la Roquetaillade, we need but make one obſervation, which is, that the chief points in his prophecy proved falſe. He foretold the entire ruin of the Clergy; the coming of an angel, who, in quality of Chriſt's vicar, would introduce a Reformation in all things, and convert all the infidels; a peace that ſhould continue about a thouſand years throughout the whole earth (13). He ſaid that all theſe things ſhould ſoon happen, and conſequently he told an untruth two ways; for nothing like this happened, either in the age he lived in, or in the following till this time (14). Here follows a paſſage from a pretty good chronicle. Joannes de Rupeſciſſa Minorum

(5) Jurieu, Preface to Accompliſſement des Prophéties, folio ***.

(6) Autor. primæ Vitæ Innocentii VI vulgatæ à Baluzio, p. 332. Tom. 1. Vitarum Paparum Avenionenſium.

(7) In the rem. [F].

(8) Ad dictum Innocentium Papam fuit adductus, per quem fuit carceribus mancipatus, in quibus permanſit per totum tempus ipſius. Idem, Ibid.

(9) Joh. de Rupeſciſſa, init. Revelationum, apud Baluzium Not. ad Vitas Paparum Avenion. p. 942.

(10) Quod autem ſunt nonnulli recentiores qui ob hæreſim in vincula conjectum dixerunt, non ita antiquiores qui nonniſi ob prophetias de Anti-chriſto proximè venturo . . . captum volunt. Spond. ad ann. 1356. num. 20. p. m. 540.

(11) Andreas Alciatus, Epiſt. contra vitam Monaſticam, p. 65, 66.

(12) Autor. primæ vitæ Innocentii VI. apud Vitas Paparum Avenionenſium.

(13) Spond. ad ann. 1356. num. 20. p. m. 540.

(14) I write this in April 1701.

prophecies. See a paſſage from Froiſſard in the remark [A]. Great notice was taken of the apologue or fable employ'd by him, to ſhew that the ſame Princes, who had enriched the church of Rome, would reduce it to its primitive poverty [D]. He wrote ſeveral books [E], part of which only are printed. Two of them are inſerted in the Appendix to Faſciculus rerum expetendarum & fugiendarum [F]. It is aſſerted (b) that he was a great Divine and a good Philoſopher. I know not whether he died in priſon; but I believe that thoſe who ſay he was burnt are miſtaken [G]. James Fodera relates, that he was buried at Villefranche, in the dioceſe of Lyons, in the convent of the Franciſcans (c). Raynaldus, who endeavoured to take advantage of a prophecy of this Monk, was very ſolemnly

(b) Trithemius, de Script. Eccleſ.

(c) Jacob. Fodera, in Hiſt. Provinciæ Sancti Bonaventuræ, p. 318, 322. apud Baluzium Not. ad Vitas Paparum Avenionenſium, p. 943.

Minorum ordinis inſignis Theologus tempeſtate hac præter ea, quæ in ſententiarum libros accurate docteque ſcripſerat, in carcerem truſus multa de futuris tanquam Propheta ſcribere præſumpſit, videlicet de duobus Antichriſtis, & de eccleſiæ conciliatione & de converſione omnium gentium ad fidem Chriſti, & alia multa, quæ in januis adeſſe affirmabat. Et hæc a domino Jeſu Chriſto ſibi revelata fuiſſe conteſtabatur, quæ non modo non evenere, ſed oppoſitum in omnibus fuiſſe conſtat. Hujuſmodi autem prognoſticatores multi ab initio decepti fuere. Quibus ſatius fuiſſet ſilere, quam talia temere loqui (15). i. e. "John de Roquetaillade, a Franciſcan, and famous "Divine at this time, beſides thoſe things which he "had learnedly and accurately wrote on the books "of the Sentences, being impriſoned, preſumed to "write many things concerning futurity, in quality "of a Prophet; viz, on the two Antichriſts, on the "union of the Church, and the converſion of all "nations to the Chriſtian Faith; and a great many "other things which he ſaid would ſoon come to "paſs. And he ſolemnly affirmed that thoſe parti-"culars had been revealed to him by Chriſt, which "not only never happened, but the very contrary to "them. A great number of ſuch prognoſticators "have been deceived from the beginning. It were "much better that they continued ſilent than to "give out, raſhly, ſuch things."

(15) Jacobus Philipus Bergomas, ad ann. 1375.

[D] Great notice was taken of the apologue or fable employed by him, to ſhew that the ſame Princes, who had enriched the Church of Rome, would reduce it to its primitive poverty.] He employed it when the Cardinals of Arras and Auxerre, went to viſit our Frier in priſon, in order to cenſure him. Du Pleſſis Mornai draws a proof from thence, of the oppoſitions which were made to Antichriſt. Let us ſee in what manner he abridges the long relation given by Froiſſard. "The ſubſtance is as follows; that the Church would "be like to a very beautiful bird, which ſhould be "hatched unfledged; and, not being able to fly, "ſhould be in danger of ſtarving. That the other "birds ſhould have taken pity on her, ſhould have "covered her with their feathers; that Kings and "Princes ſhould have enriched her with their de-"meſnes, and honoured her above meaſure. That "upon this ſhe ſhould have grown proud; or ſeeing "herſelf grown up, and imagining ſhe now had "no farther occaſion for them, ſhould peck at them, "and to quarrel with Emperors and Princes. That, "upon this, the birds would reſolve to reſume their "feathers; and in this manner the Princes would "take back their gifts and demeſnes, till at laſt ſhe "would be forced to implore their ſuccour: and the "Emperor and the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes "would ſtrip her of all, in caſe ſhe grew proud "again (16)." Du Pleſſis adds, that this apologue of the birds is manifeſtly grounded on the XVIIth chapter of the Revelations, where it is ſaid *, that Kings ſhall give their power and authority to the beaſt or harlot; but they afterwards ſhall hate her, make her deſolate, eat her fleſh, and burn her with fire. Wolfius has inſerted, in his firſt tome, all theſe paſſages of Froiſſard, and added to it a figure of the bird of the apologue (17). I am to obſerve that Roquetaillade declared, that it would not be long before the Church would be impoveriſhed, but he is greatly miſtaken. See Coeffeteau's anſwer to du Pleſſis (18). The ſame thing is ſtill predicted about the end of the XVIIth century.

(16) Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 450.

* Apoc. c. xvii. 7. v. 13. & 16.

(17) Joh. Wolfius, Lectionum memor. & reconditarum, Cent. 14. p. m. 623 & ſeq. Tom. 1.

(18) Coeffeteau, Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 1076.

[E] He wrote ſeveral books.] Beſides his prophecies, he wrote a book de conſideratione quintæ eſſentiæ, one de familiatu philoſophiæ, one entitled Vade mecum in tribulatione, and a commentary ſuper prophetiam Cyrilli eremitæ preſbyteri. Baluze (19) ſpeaks of this laſt work as being in manuſcript in the King's library; and ſays that the others are in manuſcript in that of Mr. Colbert (20). I am to obſerve that the book de conſideratione quintæ eſſentiæ rerum omnium, was printed at Baſil in 1561 (21). It is affirmed, in Geſner's epitome (22); and it is there ſaid, by an error of an hundred years, that the author lived about the year 1240. I have quoted elſewhere (23) Naudæus, who has mentioned this book of Joannes de Rupeſciſſa. There is extant a book, under the name of this apocalyptical Frier, entitled de confectione veri lapidis philoſophorum, printed at Baſil in 1561.

(19) Baluz, Not. ad Vitas Paparum Avenion. p. 1434.

(20) Idem, p. 942.

(21) The Bodleian catalogue mentions the Baſil edit. of 1597.

(22) Epit. Bibl. Geſneri, p. m. 492.

(23) Rem. [E], of the art. ALBERTUS MAGNUS.

[F] Two are inſerted in the Appendix to Faſciculus rerum expetendarum & fugiendarum.] This book was printed in London, in the year 1690; and the Author of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle made very ample mention of it in his XIXth volume (24). Here follows what he ſays concerning our author. "(25) "Two books of this Frier have been inſerted here, "the one whereof is entitled, A copy of the prophecy "of Frier John de la Roquetaillade, a Franciſcan, of "the province of Guienne, Guardian of Rhodes, and Ad-"vocate of Orleans (26); priſoner at Avignon in the "eighth year of the pontificate of Clement VI, in the "priſon called Soldan, in November, the year of the in-"carnation MCCCXLIX. . . (27). Roquetaillade's "other work is entitled Vade mecum in tribulatione. "In this book, called by him librunculus, he declares "that he is not a Prophet, as thoſe who had re-"ceived immediate revelations from God; and who "uſed to ſay, in declaring, Thus ſaith the Lord; but "that God had given him the talent of ſeeing, by "the Scripture, what was to happen (28). He "points out ſome of his books, in which he takes "notice, that he had foretold ſome events very ex-"actly; and he ſeems to have written this in "MCCCLVI. He afterwards propoſes twenty ex-"plications of the Revelations, which he calls inten-"tiones. In the firſt, he propheſies that the Pope "ſhall one day ſubdue the whole earth, which will "conſider him as its Paſtor; a prediction quite con-"trary to that of our Proteſtant interpreters, of the "Revelations, who are not much more happy, in "their predictions, than John de la Roquetaillade; "and ſome of whom are, perhaps, more blame-"worthy, becauſe they endeavour to make Princes "engage in endleſs wars, in order to give ſucceſs "to their conjectures. Our Frier at leaſt, non erat "intentionis faciendi guerras (had no deſign to make "war) and would make uſe of none but ſpiritual "arms; whereas ſome of our Roquetaillades of this "age would employ forcible methods, to oblige "erroneous conſciences to make profeſſion of their ſen-"timents, without believing them."

(24) From page 331, to p. 363.

(25) Bibl. Univ. Tom. 19. p. 348.

(26) In the Latin, p. 492, Appendicis Faſciculi, it is Cuſtodis Ruthenenſis ac Cauſidici Aureliaci. This laſt word ſignifies of Aurillac and not of Orleans. As to Cauſidicus, it denotes ſome employment which anſwers to that of Frier-Attorney of the Benedictines, or Carthuſians; but I don't know how it is called among the Mendicant Friers. I believe it is not called Advocate. ["The Latin a-"bove, Cauſidici "Ruthenenſis ac "Aureliaci, "muſt certainly "be erroneous. "It ought to be "Cuſtodiæ Ru-"thenenſis, that "is of the Cuſ-"todie (or part) "of Rhodez; "the provinces "among the "Franciſcans "being divided "into Cuſtodies. "With regard to "the word Cau-"ſidici, which "puzzled Bayle, "this is another "error, ariſing, "perhaps, from "there being in "the MSS. only "a C, or a C "with ſome o-"ther letters, by "way of abbre-"viation, ſigni-"fying Conven-

[G] I believe that thoſe who ſay he was burnt are miſtaken.] "Some ſay that he was burnt at laſt (29)." Theſe are du Pleſſis's words, who writes in the margin, Petrus Premonſtratenſis in Chronico quod inſcribitur Biblia pauperum. Baluze rejects this, and ſays (30), he cannot

(29) Du Pleſſis, Myſtere d'Iniquité, p. 450.

(30) Baluzius, Notis ad Vitas Paparum Avenion. p. 942.

"tualis or Conventus. In Baluze, p. 942, it is Provinciæ Ruthenenſis & conventus Aureliaci."] From the Paris edit. to Bayle's Dict. p. 984. col. 1 and 2. (27) Bibl. Univerſ. Tom. 19. p. 349. (28) The ſecond continuator of William de Nangis, cited by Dacheri Specileg. Tom. 11. p. 822. relates, that this Monk, being conſulted, by the Archbiſhop of Toulouſe, in order to know futurity, in 1356, anſwered, Ego ſicut unus vilis & abominabilis peccator ea quæ dico, non dico de capite meo, nec ſum propheta, ſed tantum per intelligentias Prophetarum, i. e. "I, as a vile and abominable ſinner, "do not ſpeak, out of my own head, what I ſay; nor am I a Prophet, but only by underſtanding the Prophets." He anſwered many things, the greateſt part of which did not come to paſs. See Brown's Preface, in the Appendix to Faſciculus Rerum expetendarum.

ſolidly refuted by Baluze [H].

tell whence Cæſar Noſtradamus (31) was told, that this Frier was burnt publickly, by the Pope's order, at Avignon, in 1362. The paſſages in Froiſſard would be a ſtrong refutation of this falſity, though we had not the teſtimony of thoſe, who ſay (32), that Rupeſciſſa was buried at Villefranche, in a Convent where he had taken the habit of St. Francis.

(31) Cæſar Noſtradamus, in Hiſt. Provinciæ, p. 411.

(32) Jacobus Fodera, apud Baluzium, ibid.

[H] Raynaldus, who endeavoured to take advantage of a prophecy of this Monk, was ſolidly refuted by Baluze.] He applied it to the election of Pope Urban VI. Odoricus Raynaldus an. 1379 n. 12. refert inſigne, ut ille vocat, vaticinium viri religioſi Joannis è Rupeſciſſa inventum inter monumenta Avenionenſia, ex quo multum adjuvari putat cauſam Urbani (33). i. e. "Odoricus "Raynaldus, ann. 1379. n. 12. takes notice of a fa- "mous prophecy, as he calls it, of Frier John de "Roquetaillade, found at Avignon, among other "writings; which prophecy, he is of opinion, was "of great ſervice to the promoting of Urban's cauſe." The prophecy is (34), that the See of Rome will be vacant eighteen months, and that at the time of the conclave, ſo mighty a battle will be fought between the ſeveral nations and the Tyrants of Italy, and ſo great an effuſion of blood, that it will be thought the end of the world is at hand. Then, by a juſt judgment of God, an Anti-pope ſhall be choſe, by the ſuggeſtions of a double-tongued impoſtor, ad ſuggeſtionem unius bilinguis falſarii; which impoſtor, according to Raynaldus, is the Cardinal of Amiens. But Baluze ſhews two things (35), firſt, that the prophecy does not relate to the time in which Urban VI. was elected Pope; ſecondly, that if it is referred to thoſe times, it would be more contrary to Urban VI. than to the pretended Anti-pope, Clement VII. He ſhews, by Roquetaillade's Commentary on Cyril's prophecy, that the vacancy of the papal chair, during a year and an half, refers to the time that the Anti-chriſt will appear. Now here are the characteriſticks of this time: the Kings of France and England will then fight againſt the Infidels in the eaſt. Now this does not coincide in any manner with the time of the ſchiſm of Pope Urban VI. and Clement VII. I am to obſerve, that this Franciſcan owns that the Anti-pope will be elected to the diſhonour of Chriſt Jeſus, and of the true Pontiff (36), and that the Anti-chriſt will maintain the Anti-pope's cauſe. Illud ſcandalum erit majus quia Anti-chriſtus partem Anti-papæ ſuſtinebit (37). Hence it is manifeſt, that he did not look upon the Pope as Anti-chriſt.

(33) Baluz, ibid. p. 1160, 1161.

(34) See Baluze, ibid.

(35) Idem, ibid. and p. 1459.

(36) In contumeliam Chriſti & veri Pontificis, Joh. de Rupeſciſſa, apud Baluz. p. 1161.

(37) Idem, apud eundem, p. 1459.

RORARIUS (JEROM), Nuncio of Pope Clement VII. at the court of Ferdinand King of Hungary (a), wrote a book which deſerves to be peruſed. He undertook to ſhew therein, not only that beaſts are rational creatures, but alſo, that they make a better uſe of their reaſon than man. The circumſtance which prompted him to write this book is curious and extraordinary. He happened to be in a converſation, wherein a learned man maintained, that Charles V. was not equal to the Othos nor to Frederick Barbaroſſa. This alone made Rorarius conclude that brutes are more rational than men, and immediately he ſet about writing a treatiſe on this ſubject [A]; and this was at the time that Charles V. was engaged in war againſt the league of Smalcalde. This book is not ill writ; and contains a great number of ſingular particulars with regard to the ingenuity of beaſts, and the perverſity of man. Thoſe, which relate to the capacity of brutes, puzzle very much both the followers of Des Cartes, and thoſe of Ariſtotle [B]: the former declare

(a) Rorarius, quod animalia bruta ratione utantur melius homine, lib. 1. p. 57. Amſt. edit. 1654.

[A] Immediately he ſet about writing a treatiſe on this ſubject.] There are two dedications to this work; the firſt to the Biſhop of Arras, dated the 1ſt of March 1547, and the other to Cardinal Chriſtopher Mandrucio, Biſhop of Trent. This work lay buried near an hundred years in the dark receſſes of libraries; but at laſt Naudæus printed it in France, and dedicated it to Meſſieurs de Puy; and his dedication is dated from Paris the 9th of April 1645. It has been reprinted in Holland more than once (1). I know not why it has been inſerted in the books of Phyſick, in Lindenius renovatus. I am firmly perſuaded, that I ſhall be accuſed of producing proofs ſometimes, without any neceſſity for it; but it would be unjuſt to aſſert this, with regard to what I advanced concerning the motive which engaged Rorarius to compoſe the book in queſtion. If I did not quote his own words, the Reader might naturally ſuppoſe, that I had framed to myſelf the idea of a chimerical Writer, merely to divert him; for what can be more whimſical and extravagant, than for a man to take up the pen, in order to rank mankind below brutes, only becauſe a learned man is diſpleaſed, that the Emperor Charles V. aſpires to univerſal monarchy, without having the qualities of Otho the Great, or Frederick Barbaroſſa? It therefore will be highly incumbent on me to prove what I aſſerted above. Eram, illuſtriſſime Princeps, (ſays Rorarius) paucis ante diebus, ubi de Cæſare ſermo habeatur; & fuit doctiſſimus alioqui vir, qui diceret, neſcire quo odore olens Chriſtianum orbem ditionis ſuæ facere niteretur. Haberet in ſe ſaltem quo cum Othonibus, aut Federico Ænobarbo conferri poſſet. Movit (fateor) mihi ſtomachum, dignum immortalitate Principem illis poſtponi: qui licet inſignes fuerint, ſi tamen in unum omnes congerantur, hujus magnitudini non ſufficiant. Itaque in mentem mihi venit animalia bruta ſæpe ratione uti melius homine, idque duobus libellis oſtendi (2). i. e. "Moſt illuſtrious Prince, I was, a few "days ſince, in a place, where the Emperor was the "ſubject of the diſcourſe. In this company was a "perſon, in other reſpects of great learning, who "ſaid, that he could not conceive on what grounds "that Monarch ſhould attempt to ſubdue the Chri- "ſtian world; and that he ought, at leaſt, to poſſeſs "the qualities, which might make him worthy of "being compared to Otho or Frederic Ænobarbus. "I will own that I was exaſperated, to hear a "Prince, worthy of immortality, poſtponed to them, "who, though very illuſtrious, nevertheleſs, were "both their qualities united, yet would be in- "ferior to his greatneſs. This ſuggeſted to me an "opinion, that brutes frequently make a better uſe "of their reaſon than men, and I have attempted "to prove it in two books." But he was not contented with making this ſingle declaration; he having before declared this in another dedication. Scripſeram libellos duos, in quibus oſtenderam animalia bruta ſæpè ratione uti melius homine; idque feceram, ut quorundam impudentiam, anne potius dementiam, retunderem; qui maximi omnium Imperatorum Caroli Quinti ſplendorem intueri non valent (3). i. e. "I had wrote two "little books, wherein I ſhewed, that brutes fre- "quently make a better uſe of their reaſon than "men: and this I was prompted to, in order to re- "preſs the impudence or rather madneſs of ſome "perſons, whoſe eye is not ſtrong enough to be- "hold the glories of Charles V, the greateſt of all "Emperors." If the reader peruſes the reſt of this dedication, he will find that the author of it was ſtrongly prejudiced in favour of Charles V, and a great flatterer. There have been, and ſtill are, many people like him.

(1) I make uſe of the Amſterdam edit. of 1654, in 12mo.

(2) Rorarius, Epiſt. dedicat. ad Madrutium Cardinalem.

(3) Idem, Epiſt. dedicat. ad Epiſcopum Atrebatenſem.

[B] The particulars . . . relating to the capacity of brutes, puzzle both the followers of Des Cartes, and thoſe of Ariſtotle.] This does not require any proof with regard to the Carteſians; every one knows how difficult it is to explain, how it is poſſible for mere machines to effect what animals perform. I will there-declare that beaſts have no ſouls; whilſt the latter aſſert they have a ſoul, endued with ſenſation, memory and paſſion, but not with reaſon. It is pity Des Cartes's opinion ſhould be ſo difficult to maintain, and ſo very improbable; it being, otherwiſe, of vaſt advantage to the orthodox faith [C], which is the only reaſon why ſome perſons will not quit therefore only prove, that a peripatetic muſt be greatly puzzled, whenever he is to account for their conduct. Every peripatetic, who is told that brutes are only automata, or machines, immediately objects, that a dog who has been beat, for touching a diſh of meat, leaves off eating the inſtant his maſter threatens to cudgel him again. But to ſhew that this phænomenon cannot be explained by him who propoſes it, it is ſufficient to obſerve, that if this dog's action be attended with knowledge, the dog muſt neceſſarily reaſon; he neceſſarily muſt compare the preſent with the paſt, and draw a concluſion from it. He muſt remember, both the blows he has received, and the reaſon why he received them; he muſt know, that if he flew to the diſh of meat which ſtrikes his ſenſes, he would commit the ſame action for which he was beat; and muſt conclude, that, in order to eſcape being beat again, he ought to abſtain from that meat. Now is not this certainly reaſoning? Can we explain this circumſtance by barely ſuppoſing, that a ſoul is indued with ſenſation, but without reflecting on its actions; without calling to mind paſt tranſactions; without comparing two ideas, and without drawing any inference or concluſion? If we examine the examples that are collected (4), and objected to the Carteſians, it will appear that they prove too much; they proving that brutes compare the end with the means; and prefer, on ſome occaſions, what is honeſt to what is profitable; in a word, that they are guided by the rules of equity and gratitude. Rorarius relates, that ſome horſes have refuſed to leap the mares they ſprung from; or having done this unknowingly, deceived by the artifices of a groom, threw themſelves down a precipice, after they knew what they had done. Teſtantur litterarum monumenta, fuiſſe gregis cuſtodem, qui equum ut matrem iniret, nunquam inducere potuerit; & quoniam ambo eximia ſpecie erant, fraude tamen illuſiſſe, velatis oculis, ne matrem videret: detracto poſtmodum operimento, & agnito cum matre concubitu, petiiſſe prærupta, & ſe patrati ſceleris reum peſſundediſſe. Maris hæc virtus; alibi fœminæ, ſiquidem in Reatino agro equa lacerato priùs auriga, qui flagitii auctor fuerat, eundem exitum habuit (5). i. e. "It is recorded, that a certain herdſman, "though he employed his utmoſt endeavours, could "never prevail with a horſe of his to cover its dam; "and as both were extremely beautiful, he was obliged to have recourſe to fraud, he hoodwinking its "eyes, that the dam might not be ſeen; but the "bandage being afterwards taken off, by which "means the horſe diſcovered what he had done, "he flew to a precipice, and plunged headlong, conſcious of the guilt he had committed. Such was "the virtue of a male; and now follows the like "inſtance of a female. In the territory of Reate, a "mare, after tearing to pieces a coachman who "was the cauſe of its guilt, made the like exit." What he relates, as well as other authors, how eagerly ſome dogs had endeavoured to ſuccour their maſters, to revenge their deaths, &c. cannot abſolutely be explained according to the doctrine of the Peripateticks; ſo that all their diſputes againſt Des Cartes's diſciples is loſt labour; and there is no need of any thing but the dextrous management employed by Pereira. You acknowledge, uſed he to ſay to his antagoniſts (6), that brutes do many things like what is done by a reaſonable ſoul, and nevertheleſs think that they are not performed with a reaſonable ſoul. Why therefore do you forbid me to aſſert, that they perform ſeveral things which are like to thoſe done by a ſenſitive ſoul, though theirs is not ſo. I am not ſurprized that neither Des Cartes, nor his followers, have not taken advantage of a paſſage in the Code of Juſtinian, in which it is ſaid that brutes are incapable of doing an injury, becauſe they are not endued with ſenſe (7). It is plain that the word ſenſus, in this place, ought to be taken for deſign and underſtanding.

(4) See in Lipſius, Ep. 1. Cent. 1. Miſcellan. ſeveral ſurprizing actions performed by elephants. This letter is a commentary, by way of example, on the words of Pliny, quoted in the rem. [D]. See, with regard to horſes, Lipſius, Cent. 3. ad Belgas, Epiſt. 56. and alſo concerning dogs, Cent. 1. ad Belg. Epiſt. 44.

(5) Rorarius, lib. 2. p. 72.

(6) See citat. 55 of the art. PEREIRA.

(7) Nec enim poteſt animal in juria feciſſe quod ſenſu caret. See Grotius, Flor. Sparſ. ad Jus Juſtinianeum, p. 324. edit. Amſtel. 1643. 12mo.

[C] Des Cartes's opinion . . . is of a vaſt advantage to the orthodox faith.] The circumſtance, which prompts the Carteſians to ſay that beaſts are automata, is becauſe according to them, all matter is incapable of thinking. They are not ſatisfied with ſaying, that none but ſpiritual ſubſtances are capable of reflecting, and forming a long chain of reaſoning; but they aſſert that every thought, whether it be called reflection, meditation, inferring from principles; whether it be called ſenſation, imagination, inſtinct; is of ſuch a nature, that the moſt ſubtle and moſt perfect matter is incapable of it; and that it can be found only in incorporeal ſubſtances. According to this principle, there is no man but may be convinced of the immortality of his own ſoul. Every man knows that he thinks; and conſequently, if he reaſons after the Carteſian manner, he cannot doubt that what, in him, is the ſubject of thought, is diſtinct from the body: whence it reſults that, in this reſpect, he is immortal; for the mortality of creatures conſiſts only in this, that they are compoſed of ſeveral parts of matter, which detach themſelves one from the other. This is a great advantage to Religion; but it will be almoſt impoſſible to preſerve it by philoſophical reaſons, if it be granted that brutes have a material ſoul which periſhes with the body; a ſoul, I ſay, whoſe ſenſations and deſires are the cauſe of the actions which we ſee them do. See the remark [F]. The theological advantages of Des Cartes's opinion, with reſpect to beaſts being automata, do not ſtop there: they extend to many important principles, which cannot be maintained with any ſtrength, if we admit that brutes have a ſenſitive ſoul. If St. Auſtin maintained theſe principles, tho' he allowed this ſort of ſoul in beaſts; and if he was not much puzzled about the connexion of theſe two things, he was more fortunate than wiſe. From the principles which he carefully examined, and ſolidly eſtabliſhed, it manifeſtly follows, that brutes have no ſoul, as Ambroſius Victor (8) ſhews, in his ſixth volume of Chriſtian Philoſophy (9). The Author from whom I borrow theſe words ſuppoſes, that this holy Doctor, knowing too well how to diſtinguiſh the ſoul from the body, to imagine that there are corporeal ſouls, admitted a ſpiritual ſoul in brutes (10). Now here follows a ſpecimen he gives us of the principles St. Auſtin maintained, and which are incompatible with that ſoul of brutes. Some of St. Auſtin's principles are, that a creature which has never ſinned can never ſuffer any evil; now, according to him, pain is the greateſt of evils, and brutes ſuffer pain. That the more noble thing cannot have for its end the leſs noble; now, according to him, the ſoul of brutes is ſpiritual and more noble than the body, and nevertheleſs they have no other end than the body. That what is ſpiritual is immortal; and the ſoul of brutes, though ſpiritual, is ſubject to death. There are many more ſuch principles in St. Auſtin's works, whence it may be inferred, that beaſts have no ſuch ſpiritual ſoul as he admits in them (11). I am not apt to think that St. Auſtin believes the ſoul of brutes to be an incorporeal ſubſtance; but however this be, the ſecond opinion, which is given us here by way of example, is inconſiſtent with the opinion of this great father; for that which knows is more noble than that which does not know; now St. Auſtin aſcribed ſenſation, at leaſt, to the ſoul of brutes; he therefore believed it to be much more noble than the body; he therefore maintained, on the one hand, that the more noble cannot have for its end the leſs noble; and, on the other, that the ſoul of brutes, more noble than the body, has no other end than their body. This, will it be ſaid, is of little concern to Religion. You miſtake, will it be anſwered; for all the proofs of original ſin, drawn from diſeaſes and death, to which young children are ſubject, fall to the ground the inſtant we ſuppoſe the brutes are indued with ſenſation: they are ſubject to pain and death, and yet they have never ſinned. Thus you argue wrong when you ſay, young children ſuffer evil, and die: they conſequently are guilty; for you ſuppoſe a falſe

(8) This is a fictitious name, aſſumed by one of the Fathers of the Oratory.

(9) Mallebr. Eclairciſſemens ſur le 6 Livre de la Recherche de la Verité, p. m. 380, 381.

(10) It is certain that St. Auſtin, whatever Father Mallebranche may ſay, believed the ſouls of beaſts to be ſenſitive and corporeal. Vita brutorum, ſays he, chap. 4. Of the Knowledge of true Life, eſt ſpiritus vitalis conſtans de aere & ſanguine animalis, ſed ſenſibilis, memoriam habens, intellectu carens, cum carne moriens, in aera evaneſcens. See alſo chap. 23. de Spiritu & Anima.

(11) Malleb. Eclairciſſemens, &c. p. 381, in the margin.

quit it. It is not liable to the very dangerous conſequences of the common opinion. It has long been aſſerted, that brutes have a rational ſoul [D]. The Philoſophers of the ſchools a falſe principle, and which is contradicted by the condition of brutes, viz. that what has never ſinned cannot ſuffer evil. This nevertheleſs is a moſt evident principle: it reſults neceſſarily from the ideas we have of the juſtice and goodneſs of God; it is agreeable to the immutable order; to that order which we clearly conceive God never departs from. The ſoul of brutes confounds this order, and overthrows thoſe very diſtinct ideas. It muſt therefore be granted, that the automata of Des Cartes greatly favour the principles by which we judge of the infinite Being, and maintain orthodoxy. Read the following paſſage.

(12) Viz. the diſpute with Des Cartes, concerning the ſoul of brutes.

" Religion was immediately drawn into this cauſe " (12), the Anti-Carteſians hoping thereby to deſtroy " the machines of Des Cartes; but it would be im- " poſſible to expreſs the advantage which thereby " accrued to the followers of this Philoſopher. For " they think they have demonſtrated, that by aſcrib- " ing to brutes a ſoul capable of knowledge, all the " natural proofs of the immortality of our ſoul are " deſtroyed. They have ſhewed, that none are more " obſtinate enemies to their opinion than the impious " and Epicureans; and that no greater ſpite can be " done theſe bad Philoſophers, than, by diſarming " them of all the falſe arguments they borrow from " the ſoul of brutes, to conclude that there is only " more or leſs difference between them and us. It is " a certain fact, that no ſet of people affect more " than the impious do, to make brutes come near, " in perfection, to man. In this manner the fol- " lowers of Des Cartes have intereſted Religion in " their cauſe; but they are not ſatisfied with this " reaſon. They have ſoared to the nature of God, " there to ſeek for unanſwerable arguments againſt " the knowledge of brutes, and one cannot deny but " they have found ſome pretty good ones. The " Author of la Recherche de la Verité (the ſearch after " truth) has given us the plan of it in ſome parts of " his works. Father Poiſſon of the oratory has " treated fully of that which is grounded on the " following principle of St. Auſtin, that as God is juſt, " miſery is a neceſſary proof of ſin; whence it follows, " that as beaſts have not ſinned, they are not ſub- " ject to miſery; but they would be ſubject to it, " were they indued with ſenſation, and conſequently " they have no ſenſation (13)." After this paſſage follows the extract of a book (14), in which it is ſhewn, that if brutes are indued with a knowing ſoul, it follows, I. That God does not love himſelf; II. That he is not conſtant; III. That he is cruel and unjuſt (15). He would not love himſelf; for he would have created ſouls ſuſceptible of knowledge and love, without obliging them to love and know him: he would have created them to be in a ſtate of ſin; and conſequently he would have diſcharged them from the law of order, which is nevertheleſs the ſupreme and indiſpenſible law. The ſtate of ſin is to fix upon or ſtop at creatures, as the ultimate end; and this is what the ſoul of brutes do, according to the common opinion. According to the ſame opinion, theſe ſouls are annihilated, the inſtant that brutes ceaſe to live; where then is God's conſtancy? He creates ſouls, and annihilates them ſoon after; but he does not do the ſame with regard to matter, for this he never deſtroys; he therefore preſerves the leſs perfect ſubſtances, and deſtroys the moſt perfect. But is this acting like a wiſe agent? The ſoul of brutes has not ſinned, and yet it is ſubject to pain and miſery; it is ſubject to all the irregular deſires of creatures who have ſinned. In what manner do we treat brutes? we make them tear one another to pieces for our diverſion; we kill them to nouriſh ourſelves; we pierce their entrails, whilſt they are living, to gratify our curioſity; and we do all this in conſequence of the empire, which God has given us over brutes. How ſtrangely irregular is it, that the innocent creature ſhould be ſubjected to the capricious temper of a criminal creature! No caſuiſt believes that man ſins, by ſetting bulls and maſtiffs together by the ears &c. and by employing a thouſand ſtratagems, and violent expedients, in hunting, fiſhing &c. to deſtroy animals; or by diverting themſelves with killing flies, as Domitian did. Now is it not cruel and unjuſt to ſubject the innocent ſoul to ſo many evils? But all theſe difficulties are removed by Des Cartes's opinion. I will here give a catalogue of ſome books publiſhed in favour of this opinion.

A Preface of Mr. Schuyl, prefixed to his Latin verſion of Des Cartes's treatiſe De Homine. A treatiſe of Anthony le Grand (16), De carentia ſenſus & cognitionis in brutis. A letter from Mr. de Cordemoi, to a learned Jeſuit, printed in 1668 (17). A treatiſe on the ſoul of brutes, printed at Lyons in 1676, and writ by one Dilly, a Prieſt of Ambrun. Converſations in philoſophy by Rohault. Father Poiſſon's notes on Des Cartes's method. Arnoldus Guelinck's Brutum Carteſianum. This was a poſthumous work, and publiſhed in 1688, by Mr. Langenhert, an able Carteſian, but not in what relates to the ſoul of beaſts (18); though he has thrown into a geometrical form the reaſons which prove that beaſts have no ſenſation. Several of Des Cartes's followers have ſtopt there; and forſake him with regard to the doctrine of Automata. Mr. Craanen, profeſſor of philoſophy, and afterwards a phyſician at Leyden, was a great ſtickler for this philoſopher, even ſo far as to ſuffer for him; and what perhaps may be ſtill more ſurprizing, to go ſo far as not to abandon his doctrine about the pineal gland; but he laughed at all thoſe who aſſert that brutes have no ſenſation. Mr. Regis, one of the moſt famous Carteſians of this age, did not go ſo far; he contenting himſelf with ſaying, that how much ſoever he may be inclined to aſcribe to brutes, a ſoul diſtinct from the body, he chooſes rather to ſuſpend his judgment in that reſpect (19). We might rank father Pardies's book on the knowledge of brutes, among thoſe which have been writ in favour of Des Cartes; for we there find the arguments of the Carteſians propoſed with great ſtrength, and refuted in a very weak manner. I yet think, that he was not negligent in the ſecond part of his work, and that he aſſerted the ancient opinion to the utmoſt of his power; but as he alſo did the utmoſt in his power to repreſent faithfully, the bright ſide of the modern one, this gave ſome perſons an opportunity of ſuſpecting, that he did not really deſign to oppoſe Des Cartes. Here follows the judgment of one of his brethren. Nothing can be more apt to miſlead people, than the expoſitions made by father Pardies, in his book, entitled, De la connoiſſance des bêtes (of the knowledge of brutes) wherein giving the Carteſian principles all the ſtrength they can have in that point; he goes ſo far as almoſt to convince his readers, that there is no reaſon for a ſoul to walk, drink, eat, complain; but alſo to ſpeak; and to ſpeak as long as a preacher in a ſermon of an hour long, or a Counſellor in a long plea. The Author, on account of his work, has been looked upon by the Peripateticks, as a prevaricator, who was a Carteſian internally, notwithſtanding the pains he took to refute the Carteſian ſyſtem, in the ſecond part of his book; and to defend the ancient philoſophy with regard to the ſoul of brutes (20).

(16) See, concerning this Author, Deckherrus's book, de Scriptis Adeſpotis, p. 321, 387. edit. 1686. In a letter of Arnauld to Father Mallebranche, it is ſaid that Anthony le Grand is a Franciſcan Frier.

(17) This letter was publiſhed without a name; but I find by Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, Tom. 2. p. 544. that it was writ by Mr. de Cordemoi.

(18) See Acta eruditorum, Nov. 1688. p. 624.

(19) Pierre Sylvain Regis, Syſteme de Philoſophie, lib. 7. part. 2. p. 126. Tom. 5. Lyons edit. 1691, 12mo.

(20) Suite du Voiage du Monde de Des Cartes, p. 9 and 10. Amſt. edit. 1696.

(13) Nouvelles de la Repub. des Lettres, for March 1684. p. 26, 27.

(14) Entitled, La Bete transformée en machine. The Author's name is Darmanſon.

(15) Nouv. de la Republ. des Lettres, March 1684. p. 28.

[D] It has long been aſſerted that brutes have a rational ſoul.] All I might have ſaid on this ſubject, would have been introduced in the remarks of the article PEREIRA, if I had not been deſirous of avoiding perplexity in that place. We may rank Strato and Æneſidemus among thoſe, who have aſſerted that brutes have a rational ſoul; for they taught that ſenſation could not ſubſiſt without underſtanding (21). *Idem eſſe αἴσθησιν, καὶ διανοίαν , ſenſum & cogitationem opinio fuit tum Stratonis Phyſici, qui Theophraſti auditor † fuit; tum Æneſidemi: qui  in Pyrrhonia introductionem conſcripſit. De utroque teſtis nobis Sextus Empiricus adverſus Mathematicos ††. i. e. " That ſenſation and " thinking are the ſame, was the opinion of Strato " the Naturaliſt, who was a Diſciple of Theophraſ- " tus, as alſo of Æneſidemus, who wrote an intro- " duction to the Pyrrhonia; which Sextus Empiricus, " in his book againſt the mathematicians, teſtifies of " both." Voſſius would doubtleſs have cited Plutarch on this occaſion, had he remembered the following paſſage. Καίτοι Στράτωνός γε τῦ φυσικῦ λόγος ἰσὶν, ἀπο-

(21) Voſſius, de origine & progreſſu Idololatriæ, lib. 3. cap. 41. init. p. m. 938, 939.

* Senſus & cogitatio mentis.

† Laert. lib. 5. ſive in Stratone.

 Laert. in Pyrrho.

†† Cap. de homine, ſive p. 201. edit. Aurelian.

ſchools are greatly miſtaken, if, by rejecting that, they fancy they ſhall avoid the ill conſequence ἀποδικνύων ὡς οὐδ' αἰσθάνεσθαι τοπαράπαν ἄνευ τοῦ νοῦ ὑπάρχει. Stratonis etiam Phyſici exſtat oratio, qua ſine intelligentia ſentiri omnino nihil poſſe demonſtrat (22). It is ſaid that Parmenides, Empedocles, Democritus, and Anaxagoras taught, that all beaſts are endued with underſtanding. Ab hac opinione qua beſtiæ ſenſus creduntur expertes, ad alteram venio: ſecundum quam, ut Sextus Empiricus * ait, οὐδὲν ἐστι ζῶον ἄλογον, ἀλλα καὶ νοῦ, καὶ ἐπιστήμης δεκτικά ἐστι πάντα, nullum eſt animal rationis expers; ſed omnia ſunt intelligentiæ, & ſcientiæ capacia. Hanc ſententiam Parmenidi, Empedocli, & Democrito, tribuit Stobæus in Eclogis Phyſicis †. Anaxagoras quoque interdum in hanc opinionem inclinavit; teſte Ariſtotele, lib. 1. de anima, cap. 11.  : ubi agnoſcit quidem, non uno loco dicere, mentem eſſe ejus cauſſam, quod rectè, & pulchrè ſe habet: ſed addidit, alibi tradere, τὸν νοῦν εἶναι τὸν αὐτὸν τῇ ψυχῇ, ἐν ἅπασι γὰρ ὑπάρχειν αὐτὸν τοῖς ζώοις καὶ μεγάλοις καὶ μικροῖς, καὶ τιμίοις, καὶ ἀτιμοτέροις. Idem eſſe mentem, & animam: mentem enim omnibus ineſſe animalibus, tam parvis, quam magnis; tam vilioribus, quam honeſtioribus (13). i. e. "From this opinion, that brutes are ſuppoſed not to be endued with ſenſe, I proceed to "the other; according to which, as Sextus Empiricus declares, no criminal is void of reaſon; but all "are ſuſceptible of underſtanding and knowledge. Stobæus, in his phyſical eclogues, aſcribes this opinion "to Parmedines, Empedocles, and Democritus. Anaxagoras was like ſome, ſometimes inclined to "this opinion, as appears from Ariſtotle, book 1. de "anima, cap. 11. where he acknowledges, in more "places than one, that the mind is the cauſe of what "is right and beautiful; but adds, that he elſewhere "inculcates, that the ſoul and mind are the ſame; "that there is a mind in all animals, as well great as "ſmall, of a contemptible or a noble kind." I omit the opinion which was ſo common among the ancients, viz. that living bodies included a ſoul which is part of the ſoul of the world. I own that the natural conſequence of this doctrine is, that the ſoul of brutes is of the ſame nature with that of man; but this does not prove that brutes are actually rational: for it might be aſſerted, that ſuch parts of the ſoul of the world as are united to certain bodies loſe the ſtrength or power of reaſoning; and ſince the ſticklers for the ſoul of the world did not maintain that plants were endued with a rational ſoul, they muſt have thought, that their doctrine did not oblige them to maintain that beaſts are endued with reaſon. I therefore will paſs over this opinion, tho' Virgil inſtanced it, as the beſt method of explaining all he had before ſaid concerning the qualities of bees.

His quidam ſignis, atque hæc exempla ſecuti,
Eſſe apibus partem divinæ mentis, & hauſtus
Æthereos dixêre: Deum namque ire per omnes
Terraſque, tractuſque maris, cœlumque profundum:
Hinc pecudes, armenta, viros, genus omne ferarum,
Quemque ſibi tenues naſcentem arceſſere vitas.
Scilicet huc reddi deinde, ac reſoluta referri
Omnia: nec morti eſſe locum; ſed viva volare
Sideris in numerum, atque alto ſuccedere cælo (24).

"Endu'd by ſuch examples, ſome have taught
"That beaſts have portions of æthereal thought;
"Endu'd with particles of heavenly fires:
"For God the whole created maſs inſpires;
"Thro' heaven, and earth, and ocean's depth he throws
"His influence round, and kindles as he goes.
"Hence flocks, and herds, and men, and beaſts, and fowls,
"With breath are quickn'd, and attract their ſouls.
"Hence take the forms his preſcience did ordain,
"And into him at length reſolve again.
"No room is left for death. Dryden.

I had better ſpeak of Philo, who wrote a book in which he aſſerted that brutes are rational, Περὶ τοῦ λόγου ἔχειν τὰ ἄλογα ζῶα, de eo quod bruta animalia ratione ſint prædita (25). I have ſpoke elſewhere (26) of Galen's opinion; but here follows a more expreſs proof. An animantia quæ dicuntur bruta, prorſus expertia ſint rationis, nondum ſatis liquet. Fortaſſis enim, tametſi non habeant eam Rationem, quæ juxta vocem intelligitur, nobiſcum communem, quam vocant enuntiativam; certe eam, quæ ſecundum Animam accipitur, quam Rationem appellant affectuum capacem, habent nobiſcum communem, licet alia magis, alia minus (27). i. e. "It "does not yet appear ſufficiently, whether animals "called brutes are utterly void of reaſon. For al"though they, poſſibly, are not endued, in common "with us, with that ſpecies of reaſon which is call"ed diſcurſive; yet they certainly have, in common "with us, that reaſon, which is ſuppoſed to belong "to a ſoul, and is ſuſceptible of paſſions, though in "a greater or leſs degree." Though Lactantius declares ſomewhere, that God has not endued beaſts with a rational ſoul (38), he nevertheleſs aſſerts, in his treatiſe de ira Dei, that brutes imitate men, and partake of the advantages of the human ſpecies, in all things except religion. Solus (homo) ſapientia inſtructus eſt ut religionem ſolus intelligat, & hæc eſt hominis atque mutorum vel præcipua, vel ſola diſtantia, nam cætera quæ videntur hominis eſſe propria, etſi non ſint talia in mutis, tamen ſimilia videri poſſunt . . . . . Quid tam proprium homini quam ratio, & providentia futuri? Atqui ſunt animalia, quæ latibulis ſuis diverſos, & plures exitus pandant, ut ſi quod periculum inciderit, fuga pateat obſeſſis; quod non facerent, niſi ineſſet illis intelligentia, & cogitatio. Alia provident in futurum (29). i. e. "Man alone is endued with reaſon, "that he may only underſtand wiſdom; and this is the "chief difference, if not the only one, betwixt "man and brutes; for other things which ſeem to be "peculiar to man, though they are not the ſame in "brutes, they yet may ſeem like . . . . . What can "be ſo peculiar to man as reaſon and foreſight? "And nevertheleſs ſome animals make many and "various ways of retiring from their haunts; in or"der that if, at any time, they ſhould be threatened "with danger, they may have an opportunity of "eſcaping; but this they could not do if they were "devoid of underſtanding and thought. Others "provide for the future." But notwithſtanding this, we are not to ſuppoſe that he meant to infer, that the ſoul of brutes is ſpiritual and immortal; for in that age, the connexion between thought and ſpirituality was not clearly known. Does not Arnobius evidently teach, that the human ſoul is mortal in its own nature; that it will be totally deſtroyed in hell, by the activity of the torments; and will not exiſt for ever in paradiſe, but merely by the favour of God? Does not he aſſert that an immortal and ſimple nature is incapable of feeling pain? But he himſelf felt pain, and conſequently he did not believe that his ſoul was a ſpiritual, immaterial, and immortal Being. Homo prudentiæ non pravæ, ſays he (30), ſpeaking of Plato, & examinis judiciique perpenſi, rem inenodabilem ſuſcipit, ut cum animas dicat immortales, perpetuas, & corporali ſoliditate privatas, puniri eas dicat tamen, & doloris afficiat ſenſu. Quis autem hominum non videt, quod ſit immortale, quod ſimplex, nullum poſſe dolorem admittere? quod autem ſentiat dolorem immortalitatem habere non poſſe? Nec tamen ejus auctoritas plurimum à veritate declinat . . . . . Non eſt abſonè ſuſpicatus jaci eas in flumina torrentia flammarum globis, & cœnoſis voraginibus tetra. Jaciuntur enim, & ad nihilum redactæ, interitionis perpetuæ fruſtratione vaneſcunt. Sunt enim mediæ qualitatis, ſicut Chriſto auctore compertum eſt, & interire quæ poſſint Deum ſi ignoraverint, vitæ & ab exitio liberari, ſi ad ejus ſe minas atque indulgentias applicarint. i. e. "Plato, a "man of great wiſdom, and conſummate judgment, "undertook a thing that is inexplicable, when he "affirmed that ſouls, tho' immortal, perpetual, and in"corporeal, are yet liable to be puniſhed, and ob"noxious to pain. But who does not know, that "whatever is immortal and uncompounded cannot "ſuffer pain; and that whatever ſuffers pain cannot "be immortal? Nor is this aſſertion of his very "wide from truth . . . . . He ſuppoſes, and not abſurdly, that they are caſt into torrents of fire, "and (22) Plutarch. de ſolertia Animalium, p. 961, A.

* Pyrrhoniarum Hypotypoſ. lib. 2. c. 5.

† p. 93. edit. Plantin.

 Cont. 24.

(23) Voſſius, de origine & progreſſu Idololatriæ, lib. 3. cap. 41. init. p. m. 940.

(24) Virgil. Georg. lib. 4. ver. 219.

(25) Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 2. cap. 18. p. m. 59.

(26) Citat. 38 of the art. PEREIRA.

(27) Galen. in Exhortat. ad Art. lib. ſiud. init. apud Ant. le Grand de carentia ſenſus, p. 10.

(28) Cæteris animantibus quoniam rationalem iſtam vitam non attribuit. Lactant. de opificio Dei, cap. 2. p. m. 574.

(29) Idem, de ira Dei, cap. 7. p. 529.

(30) Arnobius, adverſus Gentes, lib. 2. p. m. 52.

" and black horrible whirlpools. They indeed are " thrown into them, and annihilated by a perpetual " deſtruction; there are ſome of a middle kind, as " appears from Chriſt, of ſuch a nature that they " may periſh, in caſe they are ignorant of God; " and be freed from deſtruction, if they make a " proper uſe of his menaces and promiſes." He refutes the Platoniſts, in their ſaying that the ſoul of man is of celeſtial origin; that it is immortal and incorporeal (31); he refutes them, I ſay, among other reaſons, by the following, viz. that there is but very little difference between our ſoul and that of brutes. Nihil eſt quod nos fallat, nihil quod nobis polliceatur ſpes caſſas, id quod nobis à quibuſdam dicitur viris, immoderata ſui opinione ſublatis, animas immortales eſſe, Deo, rerum ac principi gradu proximas dignitatis, genitore illo ac patre prolatas, divinas, ſapientes, doctas, neque ulla corporis attrectatione contiguas. i. e. " We ought not to deceive, or feed ourſelves " with empty hopes, becauſe of what is told us by " certain men, who puffed up with too favourable an " opinion of themſelves, aſſert, that our ſouls are im- " mortal; next to God in dignity, and of the higheſt " order in the ſcale of Beings, proceeding from, and " begot by him; divine, wiſe, learned, and unſullied " by any corporeal imperfections." Vultis tumore depoſito cogitationibus tacitis pervidere animantia nos eſſe, aut conſimilia cæteris, aut non plurima differitate diſtantia? Quid eſt enim, quod non ab eorum indicet ſimilitudine diſcrepare? vel quæ in nobis eminentia tanta eſt, ut animantium numero dedignemur adſcribi (32)? i. e. " Will ye, diveſting yourſelves of all proud thoughts, " conſider within yourſelves that we are brutes, ei- " ther reſembling them very much, or not differing " widely from them? For what is there to ſhew " that we are not different; or what excellency do " we poſſeſs, that ſhould make us diſdain to be rank- " ed in the number of the brutes?" He examines the preheminence, which man has over brutes, and pretends to ſhew that it is very trifling. He affirms particularly that men are not ſuperior to beaſts, as to reaſon. Sed rationales nos ſumus, & intelligentia vincimus genus omne mutorum. Crederem iſtud veriſſimè dici, ſi cum ratione & conſilio cuncti homines viverent, ſervarent officiorum tenorem, abſtinerent ab illicitis ſeſe, negotia turpia non adirent, neque quiſquam pravitate conſilii, atque ignorantiæ cæcitate contraria ſibimet atque inimica depoſceret. Vellem tamen ſcire quænam ſit hæc ratio, per quam ſumus potiores animalium generibus cunctis: quia nobis domicilia fecimus, quibus poſſimus hyemalia frigora, & æſtatis flagrantia evitare? Quid? animantia cætera hujus rei providentiam non habent (33)? i. e. " But we are rational creatures, and ſurpaſs all mute a- " nimals in underſtanding. I would conſider this as ve- " ry true, if all men would live in a rational and pru- " dent manner, would diſcharge their ſeveral duties; " would refrain from things unlawful; would not " engage in ſhameful actions; and if no man, " through wicked advice and ignorance, did earneſt- " ly deſire ſuch things as are prejudicial to him. I " would fain know what this reaſon is, by which we " ſurpaſs all kinds of animals. What! is it becauſe " we build ourſelves houſes, to ſecure us from the " ſeverity of the winter ſeaſon and the violent heat " of ſummer? But are not the reſt of animals as " provident in this particular?" Arnobius may therefore be ranked among thoſe, who have taught that beaſts are informed with a rational ſoul. It is doubtleſs from him that Lactantius had learnt to eſtabliſh no other difference between them and men, but the worſhip of God. Some Philoſophers have envied man this privilege, they ſaying that brutes had a religion. Xenocrates the Carthaginian did not deny but that God was known to them: Democritus muſt have believed the ſame thing, if he reaſoned conſequentially; at leaſt Clemens Alexandrinus ſays ſo. Καθόλυ γ' ὃν τὴ περὶ τ῀ Θείυ ἔννοιαν Ξενοκράτης ὁ Καρχηδόνι῝ οὐκ ἀπελπίζει, κ᾽ ἐν τοῖς ἀλόγοις ζώοις. Δημόκριτ῝ δὲ, κᾶν μὴ θέλῃ, ὁμολογήσει διὰ τὴν ἀκολυθίαν τ῵ν δογμάτων, τὰ γὰρ αὐτὰ πεποίηκεν εἴδωλα τοῖς ἀνθρώποις προσπίπτοντα, κ᾽ τοῖς ἀλόγοις ζώοις ἀπὸ τ῀ Θείας οὐσίας. Ut ſummatim quidem dicam, Xenocrates Carthaginienſis non ſpem omnium abjicit, quinetiam in rationis expertibus animantibus ſit Dei notitia. Democritus autem, etſi nolit, confitebitur per dogmatum conſequentiam: fecit enim eaſdem imagines in homines incurrentes, & in animantes rationis expertes, ex divina eſſentia (34). i. e. " In ſhort, Xenocrates the Carthaginian is not " quite without hope, but that animals who are en- " tirely devoid of reaſon have a knowledge of God. " But Democritus, whether he will or not, muſt con- " feſs it in conſequence of his doctrine; he aſſerting, " that the like images which are in men, and in " animals void of reaſon, reſult from the divine " eſſence." Pliny ranks religion among the moral virtues of the elephants. Maximum eſt elephas, ſays he (35), proximumque humanis ſenſibus: quippe intellectus illis ſermonis patrii, & imperiorum obedientia, officiorumque, quæ didicere, memoria: amoris, & gloriæ voluptas: imo vero (quæ etiam in homine rara) probitas, prudentia, æquitas: religio quoque ſiderum, Soliſque ac Lunæ veneratio. Auctores ſunt, in Mauritaniæ ſaltibus ad quendam amnem, cui nomen eſt Amilo, miteſcente Luna nova, greges eorum deſcendere: ibique ſe purificantes ſolenniter aqua circumſpergi, atque ita ſalutato ſidere in ſilvas reverti, vitulorum fatigatos præ ſe ferentes. Alienæ quoque religionis intellectu, creduntur maria tranſituri non ante naves conſcendere, quam invitati rectoris jurejurando de reditu. Viſique ſunt feſſi ægritudine, (quando & illas moles infeſtant morbi) herbas ſupini in cælum jacientes, veluti tellure precibus allegata. i. e. " Of all animals the elephants are of the largeſt ſize, " and approach neareſt to the human ſenſe: for they " are ſkilled in the language of their country, pay " obedience to commands, remember any good office " that may have been done them, and are pleaſingly " affected with love and glory. To this I muſt add " (circumſtances that are ſeldom found even in men) " that they have probity, prudence, equity; that they " pay a religious regard to the ſtars, and worſhip the " ſun and moon. We are told, that whole troops of " them go, when the moon is in the wane, to a cer- " tain river called Amilo, in the foreſt of Mauri- " tania: that being ſolemnly purified there by ſprink- " ling of water, they, after worſhipping the moon, re- " turn to the foreſts, carrying their wearied young " ones. It is thought that when they are to croſs " the ſeas, they will not go on board a ſhip, till the " maſter who invited them promiſes, with an oath, " to bring them back. They have been ſeen, when op- " preſſed with ſickneſs, (even theſe huge animals be- " ing ſubject to it) lying with their face upwards, caſt- " ing up herbs towards the Heavens, hoping by their " prayers, &c." Dion relates part of theſe particulars (36). Would one imagine that the followers of Plato, who imagined that brutes were very probably endued with an immortal ſoul, as Paganinus Gaudentius obſerves, ſhould deny them the faculty of reaſon? Quod ſi dicas apud Platonicos ſolas animas rationales eſſe immortales, reſpondebit Alcinous non eſſe id prorſus exploratum. Nam poſtquam dixit animas rationales ſecundum Platonem eſſe immortales, mox ſubjungit *: Utrum verò & irrationales, ambiguum eſſe videtur: & quamvis ipſe ſentiat eſſe probabile eas eſſe mortales, indicat tamen id inter Platonicos non fuiſſe certum (37). i. e. " But " ſhould you ſay, that the Platoniſts hold, that none " but rational ſouls are immortal, Alcinous will an- " ſwer, that it is not very certain. For after ſaying, " that Plato declares rational ſouls to be immortal, " he preſently adds; it is doubtful whether irrational " ſouls are ſo: and though he himſelf looks upon it " as probable, that they are mortal, he nevertheleſs " declares that the Platoniſts were not certain in their " belief as to this matter." I ſay nothing of Solomon, who ſeems to ſay expreſsly (38), that the ſoul of man and that of brutes are of the ſame nature; for we muſt not take his words in a literal ſenſe, but put a better conſtruction upon them (39); but we may very well be allowed to believe, that ſeveral Rabbi's have aſcribed a rational ſoul to brutes.

There is no doubt but the famous Maimonides believed that they are endued with reaſon, he aſcribing to them a kind of free-will. Arnauld has reaſon to object to him, that it follows from thence they may be puniſhed or rewarded after death. If I relate, pretty much at length, what preceded that reflection of Arnauld, it is becauſe of certain incidents, which inform us of the opinion of ſome Jews concerning brutes. This great Rabbi explains five opinions with regard to providence, all which, he thinks, are as old as the (31) Arnobius, adverſus Gentes, p. 53.

(32) Idem, ibid. p. 54.

(33) Idem, ibid. p. 55.

(34) Clemens Alexand. Strom. lib. 5. p. 590, C.

(35) Plin. lib. 8. cap. 1. init.

(36) Dio. lib. 39. p. m. 12.

* Cap. 25.

(37) Pagan. Gaudentius, de tranſmigratione Pythagor. p. 76.

(38) Chap. iii. of Eccleſiaſtes.

(39) See the 9th and 10th chap. of the book entitled, A religious treatiſe againſt Atheiſts, Deiſts, and the modern Scepticks, printed at Paris in 1677.

ſequence of the opinion which aſcribes a ſenſative ſoul to brutes [E]. The perſons in queſtion the Prophets (40). The fourth of theſe opinions extended God's providence to all things, and did not deny man's free-will (41). Maimonides objects ſeveral inconvenient particulars, to the followers of this opinion. They ſaid that it was the effect of God's wiſdom, that there were men who, though they had never ſinned, were born with many imperfections; and that it was better to be ſo than not to be at all. We do not comprehend, ſays this Jewiſh Doctor, what goodneſs there can be in this; ſed nos iſtam bonitatem non intelligimus (42). "When they were aſked, what juſtice "there could be in the death of brutes; what ſin "they had committed; and why God, ſince his "providence extended to all things, would have an "innocent mouſe killed by a cat? to this they "anſwered; that God had decreed it ſo: but that "he would recompence this mouſe in another world. "Nothing could be more ridiculous than to aſcribe a "ſoul to brutes. But this Rabbi himſelf gives ſome "occaſion to this idle fancy, when he aſcribes a will "to irrational animals, as well as to men. Omnia "pariter animantia irrationalia moventur voluntate ſua. "For had they a will, it would be difficult to con- "ſider why they ſhould not be capable of good and "evil, of rewards and puniſhments (43)."

The Socinians do not go ſo far as Maimonides: they do not aſcribe to brutes a will properly ſo called, nor a free-will properly ſo called; they do not allow them to be ſuſceptible of vice and virtue, nor of rewards and puniſhments properly ſo called. They nevertheleſs ſay that reaſon, liberty and virtue are found in them imperfectly and analogically; and that they render themſelves worthy in ſome meaſure, of rewards and puniſhments. If the reader will not believe me, let him read the following paſſage. Quia homo inter animantia ſolus ratione proprie dicta præditus eſt, in illum etiam ſolum tum voluntas, tum virtus & vitium, tum denique præmium & pœna cadit. In bruta tamen animalia cadit aliquid ſingulis iſtorum analogum, in ea præſertim, quæ ſunt perfectiora, & diſciplinæ alicujus capaciora. Eſt enim in illis primum aliqua facultas rationi reſpondens, quam nonnulli rationem inferiorem vocant, qua non de rebus modo jucundis, ac utilibus quodammodo ratiocinantur, & de ratione illorum adipiſcendorum diſpiciunt; ſed etiam viam ſibi à Deo præſcriptam, ſeu rectam quandam vivendi rationem naturæ ſuæ conſentaneam, quæ honeſtati analoga eſt, agnoſcunt. Inde ſequitur facultas altera, voluntati quodam modo reſpondens, in qua nonnihil eſt libertatis. Hinc aliquid etiam virtuti & vitio ſimile, ſeu rectè & prævè factum: quorum illud eſt, cum bruta naturæ ſuæ ductum ſequuntur, hoc cum à naturali via exorbitant. Unde tandem etiam aliquid præmio aut pœnæ, & huic quidem maximè ſimile. Unde beſtias etiam à Deo punitas (44), aut pœnas certas lege illis conſtitutas, cernimus: qua de re legatur Socinus in Anti-Puccio. Quemadmodum ergo rationem humanam κατ' ἐξοχὴν, & propriè hoc nomine appellamus, & brutis eam adimimus (dicimus etiam irrationalia ſeu ratione carentia) ita & cætera omnia. Rurſus quemadmodum impropriè & per analogiam rationem brutis tribuimus, ita & cætera omnia (45). i. e. "As man "is the only animal who is indued with reaſon, pro- "perly ſo called; he therefore, only, is informed "with a will, and is capable of virtue and vice, "rewards and puniſhments. Nevertheleſs ſomething "analogous to each of theſe may likewiſe be found "in brutes; particularly in ſuch as are of a more "perfect kind, and capable of being taught. Firſt, "they are indued with a certain faculty that anſwers "to reaſon, called by ſome an inferior reaſon, by "which they not only reaſon in ſome meaſure on "what is pleaſant and profitable, and endeavour "how they may beſt attain them; but likewiſe ac- "knowledge a certain manner of living, adapted "to their nature, which is analogous to honeſty. "This muſt ſuppoſe another faculty, anſwering in "ſome meaſure to the will, wherein there is ſome "liberty. Hence there is alſo ſomething reſembling "vice and virtue, or good and bad, when brutes "follow the impulſe of nature, or depart from it: "whence they are made capable of rewards and "puniſhments, and particularly of the laſt mention- "ed. Hence we find that brutes alſo are puniſhed "by heaven, and that certain puniſhments are enacted "againſt them by the law, for which ſee Socinus's "Anti-Puccius. As therefore we give the name of "reaſon, by way of eminence, to that which is "found in man, and will not allow brutes to be poſ- "ſeſſed of it, and deny it to brutes, (we calling them "irrational or void of reaſon) we likewiſe do ſo with "reſpect to all other things. Again, as we aſcribe, "improperly and analogouſly, reaſon to brutes, we "do the ſame with regard to all other things." I know not whether Gulielmus Pariſienſis, one of the greateſt genius's of his age, could help going a little below this opinion; for it is ſaid that he taught that brutes have a ſpiritual ſoul, and it is not agreed that he ever recanted that opinion (46). See citation 48 of this page.

To come to the moderns, I ſhall obſerve that Valla (47) and Anthony Cittadinus (48) have acknowledged brutes to be endued with reaſon. Paſquier has wrote a beautiful letter on this opinion, and it is the firſt of book X. Montagne has declared in favour of this opinion, and maintained it with ſo much care, that one would conclude he imagined that the apology of Raimundus Sebundus was partly that of brutes. Charron has followed him in this particular, as well as in a great many others. A Phyſician of Rochelle (49) having wrote againſt Charron, was refuted by one of the beſt pens that has wrote, in French, on philoſophical ſubjects, I mean Mr. de la Chambre, Phyſician to Mr. Seguier, Chancellor of France. The Phyſician of Rochelle wrote an anſwer (50), which his antagoniſt did alſo, and entitled his work, A treatiſe on the knowledge of animals, in which all that is ſaid for and againſt the reaſoning of brutes is examined. I ſhall obſerve by the way, that Iſaac Voſſius is of opinion, that the condition of animals is much better than ours, with regard to ſpeech; becauſe they communicate more ſpeedily, and perhaps more happily, their thought than we do (51); on which occaſion he is criticiſed by a German (52). The reader may ſee the opinion of Sennertus in the remarks [D] and [E] of his article. I ſhall there take notice of ſome moderns, who imagined that the ſoul of beaſts is ſpiritual.

[E] The ill conſequence of the opinion, which aſcribes a ſenſitive ſoul to brutes.] Nothing can be more diverting, than to ſee with what authority the ſchoolmen take upon themſelves to preſcribe bounds to the knowledge of brutes. They declare, that they know only particular and material objects, and that they only love what is uſeful and agreeable; that they cannot reflect on their ſenſations and deſires, nor infer one thing from another. One would conclude, that they had ſearched more ſucceſsfully into the faculties and acts of the ſouls of brutes, than the moſt expert anatomiſts into the entrails of dogs. Their temerity is ſo great, that ſhould they, by chance, have found the truth, they would be unworthy of praiſe, and even of excuſe. But if we grant them all this, and whatever they lay down, what advantage will they reap by it? Do they imagine they ſhall, by this means, prevail with any perſon who is able to argue, to grant, that the ſoul of man is not of the ſame ſpecies with that of brutes? This pretenſion is altogether chimerical. It is evident to any perſon who is able to judge of things, that every ſubſtance which has any ſenſation knows that it is indued with it; and it would not be more abſurd to maintain, that the ſoul of man knows actually an object without knowing that he knows it, than it is abſurd to ſay, that the ſoul of a dog ſees a bird, without perceiving that it ſees it. This ſhews that all the acts of the ſenſitive faculties are, by their own nature and eſſence, reflective on themſelves. Father Maignan, who, notwithſtanding all his knowledge, has given into the errors and groſs ignorance of the ſchools, with regard to the ſouls of brutes, owns nevertheleſs, that, in order to perceive a thing, we muſt know the perception we have of it. Id quod vocamus ſentire, ſays he, non eſt ſine cognitione ejus rei quæ dicitur ſenſibilis: cum autem nihil externum ſit per ſe ſenſibile; ſed tantum per ſuam actionem; adeoque actio ejus ſit primario ſenſibilis: & cum inſuper nos non dicamur

(40) Arnauld, Reflexions ſur le Syſteme du P. Mallebranche, liv. 1. ch. 13. p. 241. He quotes chap. 17. p. 2. of More Nevochim, Doctor perplexorum, of Maimonides.

(41) Arnauld, ibid. p. 245.

(42) Ibid. p. 246.

(43) Idem, ibid.

(44) See in citat. 60, what I quote from Franzius. It is there ſaid, that God commands brutes to be puniſhed.

(45) Joan. Crellius, Ethicæ Chriſtianæ, lib. 2. cap. 1. p. m. 65, 66.

(46) In the little diſſertations prefixed to Tom. 2. of his works, edit. 1676, it is diſputed whether ever he recanted the opinion he was accuſed of advancing, with reſpect to the ſpirituality of the ſouls of brutes; where it is compared with the opinion of Des Cartes, and that of the Philoſophers who have treated of this queſtion in particular. Journal des Savans, 18 Jan. 1677. p. m. 28.

(47) Valla, Dial. cap. 9. apud Voſſium, de orig. & progr. Idol. lib. 3. cap. 41. p. 940.

(48) In lib. 1. Poſt. Analyt. cap. 3. apud eumd. ibid.

(49) Chanet, in his Conſiderations on Charron.

(50) His reply is entitled, Concerning the inſtinct and knowledge of Animals, Rochelle 1646, 8vo.

(51) Iſaacus Voſſius, de Poematum cantu & viribus rithmi, p. 65.

(52) Joh. Cyprianus, in Hiſtoriæ Animalium Continuatione, p. 20.

queſtion are not wanting either in diſtinctions, exceptions, or boldneſs, to affirm that the acts of this ſoul never paſs certain bounds preſcribed them; but all this confuſed and unintel-camur alicujus agentis actionem ſentire, ſi ea dum in nobis fit, omnino lateat nos; conſequenter id quod vocamus ſentire, non eſt ſine cognitione actionis, quæ fit in nobis ſentientibus; imo quia ſentire nihil aliud ex parte ſentientis dicit, præter eam cognitionem; conſequens eſt ipſum ſentire, quatenus ſe tenet ex parte ſentientis, conſiſtere in eo quod eſt agnoſcere ſe pati; quod coincidit cum eo quod eſt agnoſcere actionem in ſe receptam, ſeu paſſionem ſuam (53). i. e. "That which we call ſenſation, is not "without the knowledge of that thing which is "called ſenſible; but as nothing external is ſenſible "in itſelf, but only by its action, this muſt conſe- "quently be principally ſenſible. And, moreover, "as we cannot be ſaid to feel the action of any "agent, if, at the time that it is performed in us, it "is entirely unknown to us; conſequently that thing "we call ſenſation, is not without the knowledge "of the action, performed in us at the time we feel. "Nay, becauſe ſenſation implies, in thoſe that feel, "nothing beſides that knowledge; conſequently, "ſenſation itſelf, conſidered as in the being that "feels, conſiſts in its perceiving what it feels; which "is the ſame as to know that an action is received "in itſelf, or its paſſion." The memory of beaſts muſt therefore be an act, that makes them remember what is paſt, and which informs them that they remember it. How therefore can any one aſſert, that they have not the power to reflect on their own thoughts, nor to draw an inference? But once again, let us not diſpute on this ſubject; let us permit theſe Philoſophers to build their ſuppoſitions very erroneouſly, and only make uſe of what they teach. They ſay that the ſoul of brutes perceives all the objects of the five external ſenſes; that it judges that, among theſe objects, there are ſome which ſuit it, and others hurtful to it; and that, in conſequence of this judgment, it deſires thoſe which ſuit it, and abhors the reſt; and that, in order to enjoy the object it deſires, it carries its organs to the place where ſuch an object is; and that, in order to ſhun ſuch as they abhor, they take away their organs from the place where it is. I conclude from all this, that if it does not produce other acts as noble as thoſe of our ſoul, it is not its fault, or becauſe it is of a nature leſs perfect than the ſoul of man; it is only becauſe the organs are not like ours. I would aſk the Gentlemen in queſtion, whether they ſhould like to have it ſaid, that the ſoul of man, at the age of five and thirty, is of another ſpecies than at the age of a month; or that the ſoul of a madman, an idiot, or of an old man who returns to infancy, is not ſubſtantially as perfect as the ſoul of a man of abilities. They doubtleſs would reject this as an altogether groſs error, and with great reaſon; for it is certain that the ſame ſoul, which, in children, is only indued with ſenſation, meditates and reaſons, in a ſolid manner, in a grown perſon; and that the ſame ſoul, whoſe reaſon and wit are admired in a great man, would only doat in an old man, talk wildly in an idiot, and be indued with ſenſation in a child. Now it would be a moſt groſs error, ſhould it be aſſerted that the ſoul of man is ſuſceptible only of ſuch thoughts as are known to us. There are a numberleſs multitude of ſenſations, paſſions, and ideas, of which that ſoul is very capable, or ſuſceptible, though it be never affected with them during this life. If it were to be united to organs different from ours, it would think otherwiſe than it does now; and its modifications might be far nobler than thoſe we experience. If there were ſubſtances which, in organized bodies, had a train of ſenſations, and other thoughts much more ſublime than ours, could we ſay that they are of a nature more perfect than our ſoul? Doubtleſs no; for if our ſoul ſhould be tranſported into thoſe bodies, it would have that ſame train of ſenſations, and other thoughts much more ſublime than ours. This may eaſily be applied to the ſoul of brutes. It is confeſſed that it has a ſenſation of bodies, that it perceives them, wiſhes for ſome of them and abhors others. Now this is enough; it therefore is a thinking ſubſtance, and conſequently is capable of thought in general: it conſequently can receive all ſorts of thoughts; it conſequently can reaſon; it conſequently can know what is honeſt; the univerſals; the axioms of metaphyſicks; the rules of morality &c. For as becauſe wax can receive the impreſſion of a ſeal, it manifeſtly follows that it is capable of receiving a figure from any ſeal; it muſt likewiſe be granted that the inſtant a ſoul is capable of one thought, it is capable of any thought. It would be abſurd to argue as follows; This piece of wax received the impreſſion only of three or four ſeals, conſequently it cannot receive the impreſſion of a thouſand ſeals. This piece of pewter never was a plate, it therefore cannot be a plate; and is of a very different nature than that pewter-plate which I ſee there. They reaſon no better who ſay; the ſoul of this dog never had any thing but ſenſations &c. conſequently it is not capable of moral ideas or metaphyſical notions. Why does one piece of wax bear the image of the ſovereign, and another does not? It is becauſe the ſeal was applied to one, and not to the other. This piece of pewter, which was never made into a plate, will be one when thrown into the mould in which plates are caſt. In like manner, caſt that ſoul of a brute into the mould of univerſal ideas, and of the notions of arts and ſciences; I mean, unite it to a well choſen human body, it will be the ſoul of a man of abilities, and no longer that of a brute.

We therefore ſee, that the Philoſophers of the ſchools are not able to prove that the ſoul of man and the ſoul of brutes differ in their nature. Tho' they aſſert and repeat ten thouſand times, the ſoul of man reaſons, and knows univerſals and virtue, but that of brutes know nothing of all this; we ſhall anſwer, theſe differences are only accidental, and are no marks of a ſpecific difference in ſubjects. Ariſtotle and Tully, when but a year old, were not indued with more ſublime thoughts than thoſe of a dog; and had they lived in a ſtate of infancy 30 or 40 years, the thoughts of their ſoul would have been only ſenſations, and diminutive paſſions for playing and eating; they therefore ſurpaſſed beaſts only by accident; it was becauſe their organs, on which their thoughts depend, acquired ſuch and ſuch modifications, to which the organs of brutes never arrive. The ſoul of a dog, in the organs of Ariſtotle or Tully, would certainly have acquired all the knowledge of thoſe two great men.

But the following conſequence is a very falſe one; ſuch a ſoul does not reaſon, and is unacquainted with univerſals, it conſequently is of a different nature from the ſoul of a great Philoſopher; for were this conſequence juſt, it muſt be aſſerted, that the ſoul of little children is not of the ſame ſpecies with that of grown perſons. What therefore are the peripateticks thinking of, when they preſume to ſay, that if the ſoul of brutes does not reaſon, it is ſubſtantially leſs perfect than ſuch ſouls as do reaſon? It muſt firſt be proved, that the defect of reaſoning in brutes proceeds from a real and internal perfection of their ſouls, and not from the organic diſpoſitions on which it depends. But this can never be proved; for it is plain, that a ſubject which is capable of thoſe thoughts, which they aſcribe to the ſoul of brutes, is capable of reaſoning, and of all other thoughts; whence it reſults, that if it does actually reaſon, it is becauſe of certain accidental and external obſtacles; I mean, becauſe the Creator of all things has fixed every ſoul to a certain train of thoughts, by making it dependent on the motions of certain bodies. This alſo is the reaſon why children at the breaſt, fools and madmen do not reaſon.

We therefore cannot think without horror on the conſequences of this doctrine, man's ſoul, and that of brutes do not differ ſubſtantially; they therefore are of the ſame kind; one acquires more knowledge than the other; but theſe are only accidental advantages, and depend on an arbitrary inſtitution. This doctrine reſults neceſſarily and inevitably from what is taught in ſchools, with regard to the knowledge of brutes. It follows from thence, that if their ſouls are material and mortal, the ſouls of men are ſuch; and that if the ſoul of men is a ſpiritual and immortal ſubſtance, the ſoul of beaſts is the ſame; theſe are horrid conſequences in which light ſoever we view them; for intelligible jargon is of no uſe towards eſtabliſhing a ſpecifick difference between the ſoul of man and that of brutes [F]; and it is not poſſible they will ever be able to invent a better if, in order to avoid the immortality of the ſoul of beaſts, we ſuppoſe that the ſoul of man dies with the body; we thereby overthrow the doctrine of another life, and undermine the foundations of Religion. But if, on the other ſide, to preſerve to our own ſouls the privilege of immortality, we extend it to that of brutes, into what an abyſs ſhall we fall? what ſhall we do with ſuch a number of immortal ſouls? Will there be a paradiſe and hell for them? Will they migrate from one body to another? Will they be annihilated in proportion as beaſts die? Will God inceſſantly create a numberleſs multitude of ſpirits, to plunge them back again ſo ſoon into a ſtate of non-entity? How many inſects live only a few days? Let us not imagine that it is ſufficient to create ſouls for ſuch beaſts only as we know. Thoſe we are not acquainted with are ſtill more numerous. A microſcope diſcovers thouſands to us in a ſingle drop of liquid: and a thouſand more might be diſcovered, had we more perfect microſcopes. Let it not be ſaid that inſects are only machines; for we ſhould better explain, by this hypotheſis, the actions of dogs, than the actions of ants and beaſts. There perhaps may be more genius and reaſon in inviſible animals, than in thoſe of the largeſt ſize (54). We will now ſee how vainly the ſchools attempt to eſtabliſh a ſpecific difference between the ſoul of brutes and that of men.

(53) Emanuel Maignan, Philoſophia naturæ, cap. 24. num. 2. p. m. 527. See alſo Caſimire of Toulouſe, Atomi Peripateticæ, Tom. 4. p. 70. where he relates, in few words, Father Maignan's definition, and that of Caſſerius, Senſus eſt objecti in organo formaliter ſuſcepti dignotio, (ſenſe is the knowledge of an object, formerly received in the organ) and approves them.

(54) See the quotation from Pliny, cited in citation 1 in the art. MENAGE.

[F] A ſpecifick difference between the ſoul of man and that of brutes.] They ſay that the ſoul of brutes is of a material form, but that the ſoul of man is a ſpirit created immediately by God. But how do they prove this? I ſuppoſe them to reaſon only on the principles of the light of nature, without having recourſe to ſcripture or the tenets of religion; and would aſk them a good proof, why the ſoul of brutes ſhould be corporeal, and ours not ſo. They will alledge the beauty and extent of human knowledge; and the ſmallneſs, groſsneſs, and obſcurity of the knowledge of brutes; and conclude, that a corporeal principle will be able to produce the knowledge of brutes, but not reflections, reaſonings, univerſal ideas, the idea of honour and honeſty, which are found in the ſoul of man; and conſequently that this ſoul ought to be of a rank ſuperior to matter, that it muſt be a ſpirit. I will not now obſerve to them, that it is raſh in them to affirm, that the ſoul of brutes does not reaſon, and has no idea of what is honeſt: I will wave this objection, and only ſay, that it is a thouſand times more difficult to ſee a tree, than to know the act by which we ſee it: ſo that if a material principle is capable of knowing a numberleſs multitude of external things, it will be much more capable of knowing its own thoughts, of comparing them together, and multiplying them; conſequently the reflections, concluſions, and abſtractions of many do not require a more noble principle than matter. A very able Peripatetic grants this. Let us hear him ſpeak; his confeſſion will perſuade more than my objections. "If we once admit, that whatever is moſt wonderful in the actions of beaſts, may be effected alſo "by the means of a material ſoul; ſhall we not "ſooner go greater lengths, and ſay, that whatever "man does, may alſo be effected by means of a "material ſoul? .... If we once grant that brutes, "without any ſpiritual ſoul, are capable of thinking, "of acting to ſome end, of foreſeeing what is to "come, of remembering what is paſt, of gaining "experience, by the particular reflections they make "on it; why may we not ſay that men are capable "of performing their functions without any ſpiritual "ſoul? After all, the operations of men are not "different from thoſe which we aſcribe to brutes. "If there be any difference, it is only of more or "leſs; and therefore all that could be ſaid is, that "the ſoul of man is more perfect than that of brutes, "becauſe he remembers better than they do, thinks "with more reflection, and foreſees with more certainty: but in fine, it cannot be ſaid but that their "ſoul is ſtill material. It will perhaps be ſaid, that "certain operations are found in men, which cannot "ſuit with brutes, nor proceed from any principle "but a ſpiritual ſoul; and theſe principles are univerſal knowledge; that ratiocination, by which "we infer one thing from another; the idea we "have of infinitude and ſpiritual things, which do "not fall under the ſenſes. But thoſe who deny there "is any knowledge in brutes, do not therefore deny "but that thoſe thoughts and ratiocinations are in us, "ſince we ourſelves are conſcious of them. They "therefore have the ſame right that we have, to "prove the exiſtence of the rational ſoul. But beſides, "they add, that all theſe operations, we which think "ſo extraordinary, differ only in degrees from the "operations which we aſcribe to brutes; and certainly one would conclude, that to act for one end, "to take advantage by experience, to foreſee futurity (which, according to us, ſuits with brutes) "ought no leſs to proceed from a ſpiritual being, "than what is found in men. For in fine, what is "univerſal knowledge, but knowledge which ſuits "with many things, like as the picture of a man "would be like all the faces which ſhould reſemble "him? What is reaſoning, but a knowledge produced by another knowledge, as we ſee that one "motion is often produced by another? Certainly if "we once admit, that thought, intention, and reflection, may ariſe from a body animated by a "material form, it will be very difficult to prove, "that reaſoning and the ideas of men cannot ariſe "but from a body animated alſo by a material "form (55)."

(55) Pardies, de la Connoiſſance des Bêtes, num. 49. p. 100 & ſeq.

I intreat all my readers to take notice of the unhapy ſituation the ſchoolmen are in, with regard to the doctrine of the ſenſitive ſoul. They alledge, in oppoſition to Des Cartes, the moſt ſurprizing actions of animals; they make choice of them purpoſely, the better to confound him; but after all, they find they have gone too far; and furniſhed weapons to their adverſary, to deſtroy the ſpecific difference which they wiſh to eſtabliſh between our ſoul and that of animals. They would have one forget all thoſe examples of artifice, precaution, docility, and knowledge of futurity, which they have diſplayed with ſo much pomp, in order to ſhew that beaſts are not machines: they would have one conſider only the groſs actions of an ox, which does nothing but feed; but it is too late to deſire this: the ſame weapons are employed to confound them; and to prove, that if a material ſoul is capable of performing all thoſe things, it may produce all that the ſoul of man does. One muſt only aſcribe to the ſouls of brutes various degrees of refinement: muſt we not ſuppoſe, that the ſoul of a dog or of an ape is leſs groſs than the ſoul of an ox? In a word, if nothing but a ſpiritual ſoul can produce the groſs actions of a dull heavy peaſant, I will aſſert that nothing but a ſpiritual ſoul can produce the actions of an ape; and if it be ſaid, that a corporeal principle is capable of poducing all that apes perform, I will aſſert that a corporeal principle is capable of cauſing whatever is done by ſtupid perſons; and that provided we ſubtilize matter, and diſengage it from whatever is called groſs particles, &c. it will be the cauſe of whatever perſons of abilities do.

A QUESTION with regard to the liberty of the ſoul of brutes.

Some Authors inſinuate, that ſince the ſoul of man has free-will, and that that of brutes is deſtitute of liberty, there muſt be a ſpecific difference between them; that the one muſt be ſpiritual and the other corporeal. Theophilus Raynaud, the Jeſuit, publiſhed in 1630, a little treatiſe which he entitled Calviniſmus Beſtiarum Religio (56). His chief view was to prove, that the doctrine of the Dominicans reduces men to the level with brutes, by depriving him of free-will (57). Præcipuè ex eo capite pronunciavit Catholicus, cenſendum eſſe, Calviniſmum eſſe religionem beſtiarum, quòd juxta placita Calviniana, homo redigatur in ordinem beſtiarum, & hominis gradu ac dignitate excidat. Ad quod ſolidè probandum, duæ propoſitiones viſæ illi ſunt ſtabiliendæ. Una eſt, hominem in ratione hominis, conſtitui per libertatem: altera eſt Libertatem everti per Calviniſmum (58). i. e. "The Catholic pronounced that Calviniſm ought to be "looked upon as the religion of brutes, chiefly on this "account, becauſe according to the Calviniſtical principles

(56) See Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, Tom. 1. p. 224.

(57) He diſputes indeed againſt Calvin; but it is in order to infer againſt the Dominicans (whom he pretends to agree with Calvin in that doctrine) what he infers againſt Calvin.

(58) Calviniſmus, Beſtiarum Religio, Diatriba 2. p. m. 25.

better explication than that they have hitherto given. The Author, who has beſt refuted Des Cartes concerning the ſoul of brutes, would have done us a great favour, could he have removed the difficulties with which the common opinion is attended [G]. Mr. Leibnitz,

" ciples man is degraded to a level with brutes, and " diveſted of the degree and dignity of man. To " the proving of which in a ſolid manner, he " thought proper to lay down two propoſitions; one " is, that to man, conſidered as ſuch, liberty of act- " ing is neceſſary; the other, that liberty is deſtroyed " by Calviniſm." He ſuppoſes that the characteriſtic of man, I mean the characteriſtic that diſtinguiſhes him from brutes, is the liberty of indifference; for as to the liberty, which conſiſts only in being free from conſtraint, or in ſpontaneouſneſs, no ſchoolman can deny but that it is found in animals. But I will ſhew that it is abſolutely falſe to aſſert, that a ſoul indued with free-will differs from a ſoul who is not poſſeſſed of it. The ſoul of children and that of madmen is deſtitute of free-will; and yet they are of the ſame ſpecies with the ſoul that is moſt amply poſſeſſed of liberty. Add to this, that the advocates for the liberty of indifference own that it will ceaſe after this life; and nevertheleſs they acknowledge, that the ſoul of man is, upon earth, the ſame ſubſtance as in Heaven or Hell. It is therefore evident, that the liberty of indifference is not an attribute eſſential to the creature, but a conceſſion, or an accidental favour which the Creator indulges it; and conſequently ſuch ſouls, as do not obtain that conceſſion, are not, on that account, of another kind than thoſe which receive it. It is therefore a very wrong way of arguing, to employ the following argument; the ſoul of brutes is deſtitute of free-will, and the ſoul of man is not deſtitute of it; therefore the ſoul of brutes is corporeal, and the ſoul of man ſpiritual. Let us go farther, and ſay, that ſuch, as admit a ſenſitive ſoul, cannot, for any ſolid reaſon, diveſt brutes of liberty. Do not they ſay, that brutes take prodigious pleaſure in doing certain things; and that they are directed to it, in conſequence of the judgment they have made of the utility of objects; a judgment which excited in them a deſire of uniting themſelves to thoſe objects? If liberty conſiſts only in a freedom of conſtraint, and in a ſpontaneouſneſs which muſt be preceded by a diſcernment of the objects, is it not abſurd to deny that animals are free? Has not a dog, when hungry, the ſtrength to abſtain from a piece of meat, when he is afraid of being beat, in caſe he does not abſtain from it? Is not this the being inveſted with a power to act, and to not act? His abſtinence doubtleſs proceeds from his comparing hunger with blows, and his judging that theſe are leſs eaſy to be born than hunger. If we obſerve all the human actions which are aſcribed to the liberty of indifference, it will appear that man never ſuſpends them, or chooſes one of the contraries, but becauſe having compared the reaſons pro and con, he ſeems more inclined to ſuſpend his action than to act; or has more motives for one action than another. I will again tranſcribe from the Jeſuit, who wrote againſt the Carteſians. " It is no eaſy matter thus to ſepa- " rate reaſoning from thought; and methinks it is " very eaſy to prove, that when a ſubſtance is capa- " ble of thinking, it is alſo capable of reaſoning; " that it is indued with will, and liberty or free- " will; in a word, that it can act like men. The " ancient Philoſophers, and even the Fathers of the " Church, have proved that we were indued with " free-will from this general argument; that every " thing that is capable of knowing, may know good " and evil, that is, whatever is good or bad for it; " that conſequently, by conſidering theſe two ob- " jects, he can compare them together, can delibe- " rate, can determine to make choice of one and " reject the other, in which the uſe of our liberty " conſiſts. And this is ſo true, that the definition " we ſtill retain of liberty in general is this, Facultas " agendi cum ratione, the faculty of acting with " knowledge, this being the ſignification of cum ra- " tione (59).

One of the ſtrongeſt proofs brought for the liberty of man is taken from the puniſhment of malefactors. All ſocieties are agreed to puniſh them in an exemplary manner; and even, in certain caſes, to extend publickly the puniſhment to their dead bodies: they are deprived of burial, and expoſed as a ſpectacle on wheels and gibbets. If man did not act freely; if a fatal and unavoidable neceſſity determined him to have a certain train of thoughts, theft and murther ought not to be puniſhed, and no benefit could be expected from puniſhing the guilty; for thoſe who ſhould ſee the body of a malefactor upon a wheel, would not be leſs ſubject than before to that ſuperior force which makes them act, and does not allow them any uſe of their liberty. But the proof of free-will is not ſo ſtrong as it appears; for though men are perſuaded that machines have no feeling, they nevertheleſs give them a hundred blows with the hammer, when they are out of order, when they think that they may be ſet right, by flatting a wheel, or another piece of iron. They therefore would cauſe a pick-pocket to be whipped, though they ſhould know he had no liberty, if experience had taught them, that certain perſons, by whipping, are made to refrain from continuing certain actions. However, if this argument for free-will has any force, it ſerves evidently to ſhew, that brutes are not deſtitute of liberty (60). They are puniſhed every day, and by that means they amend their faults. Ochinus, in the beginning of his Labyrinths, examines all the reaſons which induce us to think that we act freely; and ſays, among other particulars, in oppoſition to that drawn from the puniſhment of malefactors; that were Magiſtrates certain, that by hanging a horſe who had killed a man, and letting him hang a long time in the high-way, other horſes would thereby be kept from doing evil, they would employ that puniſhment every time a horſe ſhould have maimed or killed any perſon by his kicking or biting (61). In all probability he did not know that this kind of ſpectacles are employed in ſome countries, to intimidate wild beaſts. Rorarius was an eye-witneſs to this; he ſeeing two wolves hung up upon a gibbet in the Dutchy of Juliers; and he obſerves, that this makes a ſtronger impreſſion on the other wolves, than the branding with a red hot iron, the loſs of ears, &c. does on thieves. He likewiſe ſays, that in Africa, lions are hung upon a croſs, to frighten the reſt, and that the inhabitants find it of advantage. Solent in Africa crucifigere leones, ſi qui deprehendantur urbes obſidere, quod in ſenectâ faciunt: quoniam ad perſequendas feras vires non ſuppetunt; cujus pœnæ metu, licet urgeat fames, deſinunt: & nos ab Agrippina Colonia Duram verſus equitantes, in illa vaſta ſylva, vidimus duos caligatos lupos, non ſecus quam duos latrones furcæ ſuſpenſos: quo ſimilis pœnæ formidine à maleficio reliqui deterreantur. At inter homines quotidie reperiuntur, quibus cò admiſſa furta tergus virgis cæſum, abſciſſæ auriculæ, ſignatæ genæ, truncata altera manus, erutus oculus, nec adhuc à furtis ſe continere poſſunt, donec laqueus vitæ finis extiterit (62), i. e. " It is uſual for the Africans to crucify lions, " whenever any of them approach towns, which they " do, when thoſe animals are arrived to an old age, " becauſe they then have not ſtrength to hunt wild " beaſts; the dread of which puniſhment, though " they are pinched with hunger, makes them refrain. " As I myſelf was travelling on horſe-back from Co- " logn to Duren, through that wide-extended foreſt, " I ſaw two wolves truſſed up, like two thieves, " hanging on a gibbet; to deter others, by the " dread of the like puniſhment, from doing ſuch " miſchief. But there are every day ſeen among " men, ſome, who for their guilt, have been whip- " ped, had their ears cut off, been burnt in the " cheek, had a hand cut off, an eye pulled out, and " yet would not leave their wicked courſes, till a " halter put an end to their lives."

[G] Could he have removed the difficulties, with which the common opinion is attended.] The publick very much eſteems, and with great reaſon, a book entitled, Le Voyage du Monde de Des Cartes (63). We there ſee very (59) Pardies, de la Connoiſſance des Animaux, num. 52. p. 104, 105. Obſerve that he cites, p. 113, the example of a dog, who had learnt to ſing his part with his maſter. He cites Vide Rorarium oratione peculiari de ratione brutor. But he ſhould have cited Rorarius, quod animalia bruta utantur ratione melius homine, lib. 1. p. 2.

(60) Obſerve, that this queſtion which Franzius propoſes, Hiſt. Animal. Sacra, part. 1. cap. 2. p. m. 16. Quæri autem poſſet an non ponenda ſit rationalis anima in brutis ... cum Geneſ. ix. ver. 5. Deus ipſe vindicare velit ſanguinem hominis in brutis, ſi quando effuderunt ſanguinem humanum. He alſo cites Exod. x. ver. 28. and Levitic. xx. 15, 16. where God enacts puniſhments againſt brutes.

(61) I have not this book of Ochinus now by me; I quoting from memory what he ſays; and perhaps I do not exactly tranſlate his words; but I'm ſure I give his meaning.

(62) Rorarius, quod animalia bruta utantur ratione melius homine, lib. 2. p. 109.

(63) Father Daniel, the Jeſuit, is thought to have writ that book.

Leibnitz, one of the greateſt genius's in Europe, being perfectly ſenſible of thoſe difficulties, very great difficulties, agreeably and ſtrongly objected to the Carteſians, and very well urged. Thoſe, which relate to the ſouls of brutes conſidered as machines, are, in my opinion, the beſt that could be propoſed. The Author ingenuouſly confeſſes the little ſkill which the peripateticks at firſt ſhewed, in oppoſing that famous paradox of Des Cartes, and the advantage which the followers of the latter drew from it. He takes advantage dexterouſly of the ill conſequences, which may be inferred from this paradox; he ſhewing, that the arguments of the Carteſians lead us to judge that other men are machines. This is, perhaps, the weakeſt ſide of Carteſianiſm; and this confirms a very judicious thought we may entertain with reſpect to the nature of human knowledge. One would imagine that God, who is the diſtributer and diſpoſer of them, acts like a common father of all ſects; that is, that he will not ſuffer one ſect to triumph entirely over the reſt, and ſink them irrecoverably; a ſect though defeated, put to the rout, and almoſt ſpent, always finds means to recover, the inſtant it leaves off ſtanding upon the defenſive, in order to act defenſively. The combat of ſects is always like that between the Greeks and Trojans (for ſome time) the night that Troy was taken.

Nec ſoli pœnas dant ſanguine Teucri:
Quondam etiam victis redit in præcordia virtus,
Victoreſque cadunt Danai (64).

(64) Virgil. Æn. lib. 2. ver. 366.

" Nor blood alone the thirſty ſword diſtains,
" Stream'd from our ſide, and pour'd from Teu-
" crian veins;
" By turns, our breaſts re-kindling virtue warms;
" And the proud victor ſinks beneath our arms."
Dr. Theobald's beautiful tranſlation of Virgil.

They vanquiſh one another alternately, accordingly as they change their manner of fighting. A Carteſian has no ſooner overthrown and deſtroyed the opinion of the Schoolmen with reſpect to the ſoul of brutes, but he finds that he may be defeated with his own weapons, and be ſhewn that he proves too much. That if he reaſons conſequentially, he will renounce opinions, which he yet cannot quit without becoming an object of ridicule, and admitting the moſt palpable abſurdities; for what man will preſume to ſay, that he himſelf is the only thinking being, and that all others are machines? Would not ſuch a man be conſidered as more diſtracted, than ſuch as are put into mad-houſes, or ſuch as are denied all converſe with their fellow creatures? This conſequence of the Carteſian doctrine is a terrible mortification: It is like the peacock's feet; it is an uglineſs that mortifies the vanity, which the ſplendor of the plumage had inſpired. But be this as it will, it muſt be confeſſed that the whole advantage which Father Daniel has againſt Des Cartes's opinion, conſiſts in the objections he ſtarted; and no way in the anſwer he made to the objections of the Carteſians. He does not deny but that their queſtions are very puzzling; but he aſſerts that they, in their turn, are ſtrangely puzzled by the queſtions put to them, and that good repriſals may be made (65). It would be to no purpoſe to ſearch, in his book, for the ſolution of ſuch phyſical, moral and theological duties, as are propoſed to the peripateticks with regard to the ſouls of brutes; he contents himſelf with anſwering, that if there are ſome things of their opinion which cannot be underſtood, there are alſo ſome things of the ſame kind in Des Cartes's hypotheſis. The definition of the ſoul of brutes, a ſubſtance capable of ſenſation, that is, of ſeeing, underſtanding, &c. is as clear as the Carteſian definition of a ſpirit, a thinking and reaſoning ſubſtance (66). Theſe are Father Daniel's words, which he afterwards proves as well as can be. He had ſaid a little before (67), that the ſoul of brutes is neither material nor ſpiritual, but a middle being between both, which is incapable of reaſoning or thinking, and only of perception and ſenſation. We muſt not blame him for writing no better on this ſubject, but the ſubject itſelf.

(65) Suite du Voiage du Monde de Des Cartes, p. 75.

(66) Ibid. p. 84.

(67) Ibid. p. 82, 83.

He will give me leave to ſay, that his hypotheſis cannot be maintained, nor can ſolve any difficulty. Theſe two words, matter, ſpirit, ſeem, at firſt ſight, to be oppoſed in ſuch a manner, as to admit of a medium; but when we examine them more attentively, we find that they may be reduced to a contradictory oppoſition. For this purpoſe we need only aſk, whether ſubſtance, which is neither body nor ſpirit, is extended or not? If it has extent, it ought not to be diſtinguiſhed from matter: if it has not extent, I would fain know why it ſhould be diſtinguiſhed from a ſpirit; for it ſuits with a ſpirit, in the notion of a ſubſtance that has no extenſion, and we cannot comprehend that this notion is diviſible into two kinds; ſince the ſpecifick attribute which may be given to one, will never appear inconſiſtent with the other. If God can join thought (68) to a being, that has no extenſion, he alſo can join it to another unextended being; there being nothing but extenſion, that ſeems to make matter incapable of thinking. At leaſt we plainly conceive, that an unextended ſubſtance, which has ſenſation, is capable of thinking; and conſequently, if the ſoul of brutes is an unextended ſubſtance capable of ſenſation, it is capable of reaſoning: it is therefore of the ſame ſpecies with the ſoul of man, and conſequently is not a middle ſubſtance between body and ſpirit. Here follows a queſtion ſtarted by Father Daniel; Will the Carteſians deny the poſſibility of there being ſuch a kind of being, as is capable only of ſenſation? And what is become of that awe and reſpect, with which their maſter endeavoured to inſpire them for the almighty power of a God, who, according to him, can order it ſo, that a triangle ſhall not have three angles, and that two and two ſhall not make four; and who nevertheleſs was not able to make a being, which was indued only with ſenſation (69)? This queſtion would puzzle a man, who ſhould have formed a reſolution never to deviate from Des Cartes's words; but we do not meet with any Carteſians who ſubject themſelves to ſuch ſlavery; and we are ſure that Des Cartes would not have aſſerted ſeriouſly, that God is able to make two foot of wax ſuſceptible of three or four figures, and not ſuſceptible of any other. Whatever opinion Des Cartes may have entertained on this head, his Diſciples will think they are no ways wanting in the reſpect they owe to God, if they aſſert, that a Being capable only of ſenſation is not more poſſible, than a piece (70) of wax is ſuſceptible only of a ſquare figure. As to what relates to a being that had only ſenſations, they will believe this very poſſible; in like manner as it would be poſſible for a certain piece of matter to be always round, in caſe God would eternally prevent the particles of it to be tranſpoſed or change their places. Father Daniel will give me leave to ſay, he did not perceive, that it is not the ſame thing to ſay, a being, capable only of ſenſation, and afterwards, a being that had only ſenſations. The poſſibility of the former is incomprehenſible, but that of the ſecond is manifeſt. But as a piece of wax, in which God would perpetually prevent the particles from being tranſpoſed, would be of the ſame kind with a piece of wax, the change of whoſe extremities would inceſſantly produce a new figure; in like manner let us ſay that a ſubſtance, which God ſhould always confine to ſenſations, would be of the ſame kind with a ſubſtance that ſhould arrive to ſo high a pitch as reaſoning.

(68) I take this word in the ſenſe of the Carteſians, that is, for a generic modification, which includes ſenſations, reflections, reaſonings, &c. as ſo many different kinds.

(69) Suite du Voiage du Monde de Des Cartes, p. 84.

(70) By a piece here is meant an aſſemblage of different particles. This I obſerve to prevent the difficulty of an Atomiſt, who imagines that the figure of an atom is eſſentially immutable.

It remains that I ſhew the inſufficiency of this Jeſuit's Hypotheſis. I. We want a ſyſtem, which ſhould ſuppoſe the ſouls of beaſts to be mortal; but this we do not find in a middle being between body and ſpirit; for ſuch a being has no extenſion: it is therefore indiviſible; it can be deſtroyed only by annihilation; neither diſeaſes, fire, nor the ſword can hurt it: it is therefore, in this reſpect, of the ſame nature and condition with ſpirits, with the ſoul of man. II. We want a ſyſtem that may eſtabliſh a ſpecific difference between the ſoul of man and that of brutes: now we do not find it by this middle being; for if the ſoul of beaſts, being neither body nor ſpirit, is nevertheleſs indued with ſenſations, man's ſoul may yet reaſon, though it be neither body nor ſpirit, but a being between both. It is more difficult for a beculties, has thrown into certain lights which deſerve to be improved [H]. I ſhall mention ſome particulars of what he propoſes, though it was only to take notice of my own doubts.

ing deſtitute of ſenſation, to arrive at the perception of a tree, than for a being indued with ſenſation to acquire the faculty of reaſoning. III. We want a ſyſtem, which may account for the ſurprizing ſkill we ſee in bees, dogs, apes, elephants; and you ſpeak of ſuch ſouls in brutes as is indued only with ſenſations, that does not think (71), nor argue. If this matter is duly weighed, it will be found that ſuch a ſoul is not ſufficient to explain the phœnomena. Father Daniel owns this in another part of his work, in which he ſeems to allow the Peripateticks no other advantage but that of poſſeſſion; for after having touched upon the difficulties found in the Carteſian principles, with reſpect to brutes, he adds (72): The Peripateticks have alſo, doubtleſs, their difficulties to ſolve: but yet, were they much more conſiderable than they are, yet ſo long as the Carteſians have nothing to ſay that is more ſatisfactory or intelligible, we ought to keep to the former, and argue on this particular point, as a great Miniſter did five and twenty years ago, on the whole body of philoſophy. He was adviſed not to let his eldeſt ſon learn the ancient philoſophy, becauſe (as it was ſaid to him) it is all trifling and ſilly. I alſo have been told, ſays he, that there are a great many idle, chimerical things in the new; and therefore, continued he, ſince I am to chooſe between the ancient and new fooleries, we ought to prefer the former to the latter. Perhaps Nihuſius reaſoned after this manner.

(71) I here employ the word thinking, for a kind of perception, and not according to the general notion of Des Cartes.

(72) Suite du Voiage du Monde de Des Cartes, p. 105, 106.

[H] Mr. Leibnitz . . . . . has thrown in certain lights which ought to be improved.] He approves (74) the ſentiment of ſome moderns, that animals are organized in the ſeed; and he alſo believes (75), that matter alone cannot conſtitute a true unity; and therefore that every animal is united to a form, which is a ſimple, indiviſible, and only true ſingle being. Farther he ſuppoſes (76) that this form never leaves its ſubject; whence it reſults, that, properly ſpeaking, there is neither death nor procreation in nature. He excepts (77) the ſoul of man on this occaſion, he putting it apart, &c. This hypotheſis (78) delivers us from part of the difficulties. The buſineſs is not any longer to anſwer the mighty objections which are made to the ſchoolmen. The ſoul of brutes, ſay their adverſaries, is a ſubſtance diſtinct from the body; it therefore muſt be produced by creation, and deſtroyed by annihilation. Heat (79) muſt then have the power to create ſouls, and to annihilate them (80); and can any thing be more abſurd than ſuch an aſſertion? The anſwers, which the Peripatetics make to this objection do not deſerve to be anſwered, nor to be brought out of the obſcurity of the ſchools, where they are taught to young ſcholars; they can only convince us, that the objection, with regard to them, is invincible. They do not come off better, when they are deſired to find out ſome ſenſe, and ſome ſhadow of reaſon, in the continual production of an almoſt numberleſs multitude of ſubſtances which are totally deſtroyed a few days after; though they are much nobler and much more excellent than matter which never loſes its exiſtence. Leibnitz's hypotheſis removes all this, by inducing us to believe, I. That God, at the beginning of the world, created the forms of all bodies, and conſequently the ſouls of all beaſts. II. That theſe ſouls have exiſted ever ſince that time, united inſeparably to the firſt organized body in which God has fixed them. This frees us from the neceſſity we ſhould otherwiſe be reduced to, of having recourſe to the tranſmigration of ſouls which we otherwiſe ſhould be obliged to do. However, that the reader may ſee whether I have taken his meaning, I ſhall tranſcribe a paſſage from him (81). "Here the tranſformations of Swammerdam, Malpighi, and Leeuwenhoeck, who have made the moſt excellent obſervations of any in our age, came to my aſſiſtance; and made me more eaſily admit, that animals, and all other organized ſubſtances, do not begin at that time we ſuppoſe; and that their ſeeming generation is only an unfolding, and a kind of augmentation. And indeed I obſerved, that the Author of the ſearch after truth, Mr. Regis, Mr. Hartſoeker, and other learned men, have not deviated very far from this opinion. But the greateſt queſtion ſtill remained, viz. what becomes of thoſe ſouls or forms when the animal dies, or when the individuum of the organized ſubſtance is deſtroyed. And this puzzles the more, becauſe it does not appear very rational, that ſouls ſhould remain uſeleſs in a chaos of confuſed matter. This made me at laſt ſuppoſe, the only reaſonable opinion I could embrace, was that of the preſervation, not only of the ſoul, but alſo of the animal itſelf, and its organized machine; though the deſtruction of its groſs particles has reduced it to ſmalneſs, which is as imperceptible to ourſelves, as it was before birth was given to it. And indeed, no perſon can fix the true time of his death, which, for a long time, may paſs for a ſimple ſuſpenſion of viſible actions; and in the main, is nothing elſe in mere animals, as is manifeſt from the ſuſcitations of flies drowned, and afterwards buried in pulverized chalk, and ſeveral inſtances of the like nature, which ſhew plainly enough, that there would be many more reſuſcitations, and much higher, were men able to put the machine in order again. It is therefore natural to ſuppoſe, that as the animal was always living and organized (as ſome perſons of great penetration begin to acknowledge) it always continues ſo. And ſince there thus is no new birth, nor an entirely new generation of the animal, it follows that there will not be any final extinction, nor entire death, in a ſtrict metaphyſical ſenſe; and conſequently that, inſtead of the tranſmigration of ſouls, there is only a transformation of the ſame animal, according as the organs are differently bent or folded, or more or leſs unfolded."

(73) See the rem. [H] of this art.

(74) See Mr. Leibnitz's piece, inſerted in the Journal des Savans, for June 27. 1695. p. 449. Dutch edit.

(75) Journ. des Savans, for June 27. 1695. p. 446.

(76) Ibid. p. 447.

(77) Ibid. p. 448, 450.

(78) Bernier, in his Relation of the Heathens of Indoſtan, p. m. 200. ſpeaks of an opinion of the Philoſophers of that country, very like this.

(79) Chickens are hatched by putting eggs into ovens, which are heated by degrees. This is practiſed in Egypt.

(80) Many ſorts of animals may be deſtroyed, by putting them into an oven a little too much heated.

(81) Journ. des Savans, 27 June, 1695. p. 449.

I will obſerve by the way, that ſome perſons are of opinion, that the primitive ſubject to which our ſoul is united, iſſues with it from our bodies, when we die. Poiret is almoſt of this opinion; and even believes that Moſes appeared the day of the tranſmigration, with the true body which accompanied his ſoul when he quitted this life; that is, as he explains it, when that bleſſed ſoul only left the cover or caſe, which enwrapped the ſubtile body to which it was united. He calls the carcaſe by the name of caſe, or ruſt, with reſpect to the true ſubject which is united to the ſoul. His words are as follow: Cùm Deus ſit conſtans in ſuis operibus, maxime in præcipuis, & quoad fundamentaliora, condideritque mentes quaſdam, humanas nempe, corporibus annexas; probabile non eſt, id opus vel per aliquod tempus ex toto interrumpi atque deſtrui: & ex hiſtoriis ſacris habemus, Moſen, cujus cadaver omnino cecidit, cum Elia apparuiſſe Apoſtolis Chriſtum in transfiguratione radiantem ſpectantibus: id quod ſine corpore, cui mens fuerit juncta, fieri non poterat. Nonnulli ad corpus ex aëre aſſumptum recurrunt: at quid ni id ex ipſo Moſis corpore (& ſic de cæteris) eſſet, portio nempe materiæ illius internæ ſpiritualioris, ſubtilioris & purioris, quæ depoſito cadavere, ſeu tegmine vel cortice aut ſcabie vel rubigine quadam, exhalaret, & menti adhuc unita, ejus regimine, ſecundum Dei placitum, dirigeretur (82)? i. e. "Since God is conſtant in all his works, particularly in ſuch as are the chief and fundamental, and has formed certain minds, viz. thoſe of men, joined to bodies; it is no ways probable, that ſuch a work is totally interrupted or deſtroyed, though but for a time. And we are told in Scripture, that Moſes, whoſe body died, appeared with Elias to the Apoſtles, beholding Chriſt ſhining glorioufly in the tranſmigration; which could not be done without a body to which a mind was joined. Some have recourſe to a body of air (an airy vehicle) but why might it not be from the body of Moſes itſelf (and ſo of others) viz. a portion of that internal, more ſpiritual, ſubtile, and purer matter, which the carcaſe, cover, bark, being put off, as a cruſt, or ruſt, exhaled; and being yet united to the mind, was thereby directed and governed, as God thought proper?" He publiſhed ſome objections, that were ſent him from Sedan. It was objected to him, among other inſtances (83), that the example of Moſes doubts. But to return to Rorarius; I fancy I am not miſtaken, in declaring it my opinion, that he was born in Pordenone in Italy [I]. I wiſh I could have ſeen the ſpeech he made in favour of rats (b), which was printed in the country of the Griſons, in 1548. There is ſomething like this in the writings of Preſident Chaſſanée (c). I ſhall here (d) preſent my Readers with the remainder of the collection, the chief part of which was in the article PEREIRA.

(82) Poiret, Cogitat. rational. de Deo, anima, & malo, in Appendice, num. 1. p. 611. edit. Amſterdam 1685.

(83) Idem, Reſponſ. ad primas Object. p. 696.

(b) Oratio pro muribus adverſus Nicolai Boſtii edictum. Auguſtæ Rheticæ ap. Phil. Ulhard. Draudius, Bibl. p. 1093.

(c) Vide Thuan. lib. 6. p. 126.

(d) See the rem. [D].

I have heard from ſeveral hands, that many perſons who delight in the hiſtory of opinions, have approved the collections which I publiſhed in the remarks of this article. They even declared their deſire of my publiſhing others, in caſe any new ones ſhould come

Moſes proves nothing, becauſe that this great Prophet could not be ſeen by the Apoſtles, unleſs a great deal of matter had been added to that, which iſſued out of his body when his ſoul quitted it. But if it was neceſſary to give him above half a new body, we may very well ſuppoſe, that all the matter, which was ſeen about him that day, was new. Poiret anſwered (84), that the ſubtile matter, which iſſues out of the body with the ſoul, is too delicate to ſtrike our groſs ſenſes; but yet that we can ſee it, when we are aſſiſted, in an extraordinary manner, by Heaven. He was told, that ſome ſchoolmen admit a quinteſcence, to tie or join the human ſoul with the organs formed of the four elements; and to ſerve as a vehicle to it, when death makes it leave the body. They alſo ſay, that this vehicle feels the torments, which the reprobate endure, before the reſurrection. Obſervo opinionem viri docti non multum diſcrepare à quorundam Scholaſticorum placitis, qui præter quatuor elementa neſcio quam quintam eſſentiam venire in compoſitum humani corporis opinantur, quæ ſit veluti medium quoddam vinculum, quo incorporeus & immortalis animus cum terreno ac mortali corpore copuletur: aliter enim ſi res eſſet, nulla videretur eſſe proportio & convenientia inter corpus & animam rationalem: & illam quidem quintam eſſentiam naturæ cœleſtis eſſe volunt, eamque ferre animum, quando per mortem à corpore migrare cogitur, & in ea pœnas apud inferos luere ſceleribus ſuis promeritas (85). i. e. "I obſerve that the opinion of the learned man "is not very different from the principles of ſome "ſchoolmen, who think, that, abſtracted from the "four elements, there is I know not what fifth "eſſence in the compoſition of the human body, "which is a ſort of middle band, whereby the incorporeal and immortal ſoul is joined to the terreſtrial and mortal body; for was this otherwiſe, there would not appear any proportion or "agreement between the body and the rational ſoul: "and they are of opinion that this fifth eſſence is of "a celeſtial nature; and that it carries this ſoul "whenever it is obliged, by death, to leave the "body; and therein ſuffers in Hell the torments "which its crimes deſerved." Poiret anſwered (86), that he had nothing to do with the notions of the ſchoolmen. See the margin (87).

(84) Poiret, Reſponſ. ad primas Object. p. 697.

(85) Ibid. p. 696.

(86) Ibid. p. 197.

(87) The anonymous Platoniſt, Author of Philoſophia vulgaris refutata, printed in 1690, ſays that Ockham, Maironi, Antonius Mirandulanus, Garbius, Licetus, declare the ſoul of man to be compoſed of two ſubſtances, alia immateriali quæ à Deo creatur, alia materiali quæ ex traduce propignatur, &c.

Some things in Leibnitz's hypotheſis are liable to ſome difficulties, though they ſhew the ſtrength and compaſs of his genius. He is of opinion, for inſtance, that the ſoul of a dog acts independently on bodies; that he has every thing from within himſelf, by a perfect ſpontaneouſneſs with regard to itſelf, and nevertheleſs with a perfect conformity to external things. . . . . That its internal perceptions ariſe from its original conſtitution, that is repreſentative (capable of expreſſing the beings out of itſelf with regard to its organs) which was beſtowed upon it from the time of its creation, and which forms its individual character (88). Whence it follows, that it would be ſenſible to hunger and thirſt at ſuch an hour, though there ſhould be nobody in the Univerſe; though nothing ſhould exiſt but God and that ſoul. He explains (89) his thoughts by the example of two pendulums, which ſhould agree perfectly: that is, he ſuppoſes, that according to the particular laws which put the ſoul in action, it muſt have the ſenſation of hunger at ſuch an hour; and that, according to the particular laws which regulate or direct the motion of matter, the body, which is united to the ſoul, muſt be modified at the ſame hour; as it is modified when the ſoul is hungry. I ſhall not prefer this ſyſtem to that of occaſional cauſes, till its able author has improved it. I cannot comprehend a concatenation of internal and ſpontaneous actions, which would cauſe the ſoul of a dog to feel pain, immediately after having felt pleaſure, though it were ſingle and alone in the univerſe. I comprehend why a dog paſſes immediately from pleaſure to pain, when, being very hungry, and eating a piece of bread, he is immediately after beaten with a ſtick; but that his ſoul ſhould be formed in ſuch a manner, that at the inſtant he is ſtruck he ſhould feel pain, though he were not ſtruck, though he even ſhould continue to eat bread unmoleſted, this is what I cannot comprehend. I alſo think the ſpontaneouſneſs of this ſoul quite inconſiſtent with painful ſenſations; and, in general, with all ſuch perceptions as ſhould be unpleaſing to it. Beſides, the reaſon why this learned man does not like the Carteſian ſyſtem ſeems to me a falſe ſuppoſition; for we cannot ſay that the ſyſtem of occaſional cauſes brings in God acting by a miracle (90), Deum ex machina, in the reciprocal dependance between ſoul and body; for as God intervenes there only according to general laws, he does not act in an extraordinary manner. Does the internal and active virtue, communicated to the forms of bodies, according to Leibnitz, know the ſeries of actions it muſt produce? In no manner; for we know by experience, that we are ignorant whether we ſhall have ſuch and ſuch perceptions in an hour: the forms muſt therefore be directed by ſome external principle, in the production of their acts. But would not this be Deus ex machina, as in the ſyſtem of occaſional cauſes (91)? To conclude, as he very juſtly obſerves, that all ſouls are ſimple and indiviſible, one cannot conceive how they can be compared to a pendulum; that is, that they, by their original conſtitution, can diverſify their operations, by making uſe of the ſpontaneous activity they ſhould receive from their Creator. We clearly conceive, that a ſimple being will always act in an uniform manner, if it be not hindred by ſome external cauſe. If it was compoſed of ſeveral pieces, like a machine, it would act different ways; becauſe the particular activity of each piece might change, every inſtant, the progreſs of the reſt; but where ſhall we find the cauſe of a change of operation in a ſimple ſubſtance?

(90) Ibid.

(91) See the objections made to Leibnitz, by Mr. S. F. (Mr. Foucher) in the Journ. des Savans, for Sept. 12. 1695. p. 639 & ſeq.

[I] I fancy I am not miſtaken, in declaring it my opinion, that he was born in Pordenone in Italy.] The ground I go upon is this. He ſays that he was born not far from Sacillum. Proximum eſt patriæ meæ Sacillum oppidum (in quo doctiſſimus Franciſcus Amaltheus publico ſtipendio humaniores litteras profitetur, cujus ſub ductu pueritiæ meæ rudimentum depoſui) amœnum flumine. i. e. "Not far from the place of my birth is Sacil-"lum, (in which the moſt learned Francis Amal-"theus is public profeſſor of polite literature, and "under whom I purſued my juvenile ſtudies) whoſe "beauty is very much heightned by a river." This parentheſis is not uſeleſs here, as it informs us where Rorarius carried on his firſt ſtudies; and that the three brothers, who have made the name of Amaltheus (92) ſo famous, were not the only perſons of that name who were men of learning. It is certain that Sacillum is not far (93) from Portus Naonis, or Pordenone as the Italians, or Portenau, as the Germans call it (94). The dedication of Rorarius's book to the Biſhop of Arras is dated from Portus Naonis: and there is a Phyſician of the ſame city, and whoſe name was NICHOLAS RORARIUS. He wrote a book printed at Venice in 1566, and 1572, and entitled Contradictiones, Dubia, & Paradoxa in Libros Hippocratis, Celſi, Galeni, Aetii, Æginetæ, Avicennæ, cum eorundem conciliationibus. Here follows what is ſaid of this writer in Lindenius Renovatus. Nicolaus Rorarius Utinenſis Medicus vixit circa A. C. 1563. Renatus Moreau de V. S. in Pleurit. This does not mean that he

(92) Hieronymus, Joannes Baptiſta, and Cornelius Amalthei. Their Latin poems were printed at Amſterdam in 1689, with a preface by Grævius.

(93) See Leandro Alberti, in Deſcriptione Italiæ, p. m. 750.

(94) See Baudrand, under the word Portus Naonis.

come in my way; for which reaſon I ſhall take the liberty to introduce ſome ſupplements [K], though I am ſenſible that many of my Readers will not be pleaſed with, and he was born in Udina, but only that he practiſed Phyſick there. Konig has therefore committed an error where he ſays, Rorarius (Nicol.) de Portunnone, Utinenſis, collegit conciliationes contradictionum in ſcriptis Medicorum anno 1566. The omiſſion of the word Medicus after Utinenſis miſleads us; it making us ſuppoſe that this Phyſician was a native of Udine, and that de Portunnone was a ſirname of his family. Doni dedicated one of the chapters of his Ramo della Zucca (95) to Gregorio Rorario of Pordonnone.

(95) It is the Chiachera ultima, fol. m. 64. verſo.

AUTHORS who thought that brutes are indued with a rational ſoul.

[K] For which reaſon I ſhall take the liberty to introduce ſome ſupplements.] I will begin by mentioning ſuch authors as think that brutes are indued with a rational ſoul. I believe no perſon has exaggerated more on this occaſion than the Philoſopher Celſus; for, attempting to oppoſe the aſſertion of the Chriſtians, viz. that all things were made for man, he endeavours to ſhew, that brutes are as excellent as man, and even that they ſurpaſs him. He declares (96) that they have a form of government, and that they follow the dictates of juſtice and charity (97). He pretends that ants converſe with one another. When they meet, ſays he, they talk together, by which means they never loſe their way. They therefore are indued with reaſon in all its gradations; they have naturally the ideas of certain univerſal truths; they have the faculty of ſpeech; they have the knowledge of fortuitous things, and are able to expreſs them (98). He affirms that there are beaſts (99) who are acquainted with the ſecrets of Magic (100): for which reaſon mankind cannot boaſt of it, as an advantage they poſſeſs ſuperior to brutes. He expreſſes himſelf on this occaſion as follows. If man is vain of his knowing the ſecrets of Magic, yet ſerpents and eagles are better acquainted with it than he is. For they have ſeveral antidotes againſt poiſons and diſeaſes; and they are acquainted with the virtues of certain ſtones, by which they cure their young; which men value ſo much, that when they have found them they imagine they have fallen upon a treaſure . . . . . (101). After this, attempting to ſhew at large, that men, upon pretence of knowing the deity, ſhould not therefore pretend to be ſuperior, on that account, to all mortal beings; ſince there are ſome beings devoid of reaſon, who have a pure and diſtinct idea of it; at the ſame time that the moſt ſubtle, whether Greeks or Barbarians, have in all countries ſo many diſputes about it, he adds: If any one pretends to rank man above the reſt of the animals, becauſe he is capable of knowing the Deity, and to receive the idea and impreſſion of it; let him know that there are ſeveral, among them, who may boaſt the ſame advantage, and with ſome foundation. For what can be more divine, than to foreſee and foretel things to come? Now, the reſt of the animals, and birds in particular, are in that reſpect the inſtructors of men; and the art of our ſoothſayers conſiſts only in underſtanding what thoſe animals teach them. Birds therefore, and the reſt of the animals qualified for divination, to whom God reveals futurity, ſhew it us by ſigns and ſymbols; which is a proof that they have naturally more correſpondence, and a more intimate one, with the Deity than we have; that they ſurpaſs us in knowledge, and are dearer to God than we. The moſt learned men ſay likewiſe, that theſe animals converſe together in a much more holy and nobler manner than we do: and that they themſelves underſtand their language, as they prove it, when, after telling us that birds ſay they will go to ſuch a place, and will there do ſuch a thing, they ſhew us, that they really go and perform ſuch things. With regard to elephants, no creature ſhews a more religious reſpect for oaths (102), or who are attached with a more inviolable fidelity to God: which doubtleſs muſt proceed wholly from their knowing him. I ſhall not tranſcribe what Origen anſwers to all theſe particulars. It is enough that I inform my readers, that he refutes them in the work he wrote againſt Celſus.

(96) To bees and ants.

(97) See Origen againſt Celſus, lib. 4. p. m. 180.

(98) Ibid. p. 181, 182. This is according to Bouhereau's tranſlation.

(99) Ibid. p. 182.

(100) He means natural magic.

(101) Ibid. p. 183, 184.

(102) See citat. 35 above.

(103) See Oſiander, Annotat. in Libr. Grotii de Jure Belli & Pacis, p. 213.

Salmaſius muſt be ranked amongſt ſuch of the moderns, as imagined that animals are indued with reaſon; and ſays that the inſtances which might be given of this would fill a book (103). Oſiander diſapproves of this opinion. See his notes on Grotius's book de Jure Belli & Pacis, in the chapter wherein he rejects the definition of the law of nature adopted by Juſtinian, Book 1. of the Inſtitutes (104). According to this definition men and beaſts have the knowledge of the law of nature. Moſt of thoſe who approve it, go upon this hypotheſis, that they are not deprived of the uſe of reaſon; but the greateſt part of thoſe, who reject that notion of the law of nature, build upon the contrary hypotheſis. Oſiander is of the former (105), and he is pleaſed with Grotius for not approving Juſtinian's definition, in which, ſays he, Laurentius Valla, Franciſcus Conanus, Dominicus Sotus, and many others had ſerved him as guides. We ſhall ſee below (106) a doctrine of Grotius, which he has cenſured, with regard to the principle of ſome actions, which ſeem reaſonable, in brutes. James Antonius Cappella, a Neapolitan Phyſician, publiſhed in 1641 Opuſculum paradoxicum quod ratio participetur à brutis (107). I have not ſeen this book, and therefore cannot tell in what manner the author goes about to prove it. I am better acquainted with the doctrine of Dr. Willis, who ſays that the ſoul of brutes is compoſed of organs; and is of the ſame form, or ſhape, and of the ſame ſize, with the body it animates; but that it is not ſo thick; and that the particles of it are ſo delicate as to be inviſible; and that they would be eaſily ſcattered or diſſipated, did not the animal's body keep or hold them together. Iſta particularum ſubtilium congeries, ſive anima, quæ ſeſe latiùs explicans, & particulas ſuas aliis craſſioribus inſinuans, & intertexens corpus fabricat, juxta figuram & dimenſionem iſtius corporis exactè conformatur, ipſi coextenditur, & tanquam capſulæ, aut vaginæ ad amuſſim adaptatur, totum ac ſingulas partes ejus actuat, vivificat, ac inſpirat; porrò invicem, ipſamet anima, ex ſe ſtatim diſſolvi, tenueſque in auras evaneſcere apta, à corpore continenti, in ſubſiſtentiâ ſuâ & actu conſervatur. Ità quidem Anima, tenuiſſima licet, corporea, corporis quaſi ſpectrum, ſive larva umbratilis videtur: Porrò hæc ſimul cum corpore ex materiâ ritè diſpoſitâ emergens, hypoſtaſin, ſive ſubſiſtentiam ſuam, non minùs quàm corpus, juxta Ideam, ſive Typum ipſimet ex naturæ lege præſtitutum accipit; quamvis autem corpore intimè uniatur, ejuſque velut ſubtegmen exiſtat, attamen texturâ ſubtiliſſimâ, & quaſi filo admodum prætenui conſtans, ſenſibus noſtris percipi nequit, at ſolummodo ab effectis & operationibus ſuis dignoſcitur (108). i. e. "That aſſemblage of ſubtile particles, "or the ſoul, which ſpreading itſelf, and inſinuating or blending its particles with others of a more "groſs kind, forms the body, is exactly ſuited or "conformed to the ſhape and dimenſions of that "body; is co-extended with it; and directly fitted "to it as a caſe or ſheath; actuating, giving life and "ſpirit to all and every part of it. Moreover, the "ſoul itſelf, being apt ſoon to diſſolve, and to va"niſh away in air, is preſerved in its ſubſiſtence and "office by the body's containing it. And ſo in"deed the ſoul, though extremely ſubtile, yet ſeems "to be corporeal, as it were the phantom of the "body, or a ſhadowy ghoſt. Farther, the ſoul ariſ"ing together with the body, from matter properly "diſpoſed, receives its hypoſtaſies or ſubſiſtence, no "leſs than the body, according to the idea or type "allotted to it by the law of nature; but tho' it be "intimately united to the body, and is as it were "its woof, yet being compoſed of a moſt delicate "texture, and of a very fine thread, it therefore eſ"capes the perception of our ſenſes, and is only "known by its effects and operations." He aſcribes a kind of reaſon to this ſoul, of which he himſelf gives the analyſis (109). He is of opinion, that man is poſſeſſed of a ſoul exactly like this, and what is more, a ſpiritual ſoul; and he pretends to explain, by this duplicity of ſouls, the ſtruggle we feel in our ſelves, and which the other Philoſophers explain by the ſuperior and inferior faculty of a ſimple and ſingle ſpiritual ſubſtance, which they call the rational ſoul (110). With ſubmiſſion to him, this way of explaining the ſtruggle between reaſon and the ſenſitive

(104) Jus naturale eſt quod natura omnia animalia docuit. Nam jus iſtud non humani generis proprium eſt, ſed omnium animalium quæ in cœlo quæ in terra quæ in mari naſcuntur... Videmus enim cætera quoque animalia illius juris peritia cenſeri. Inſtitut. lib. 1. Tit. 2.

(105) Oſiander, Annotat. in Libr. Grotii de Jure Belli & Pacis, p. 206 & ſeq.

(106) See citat. 119.

(107) Nicol. Toppi, Bibl. Napoletan. p. 124.

(108) Thomæ Willis, de Anima Brutorum, part. 1. cap. 2. p. m. 14, 15.

(109) Idem, ib. cap. 7. p. 91, 92.

(110) Idem, ib. cap. 7.

and look upon them as mere excreſcences. But they will have no reaſon to give that name

ſenſitive ſoul is not capable of giving ſatisfaction; for every one knows by experience, that the principle, which is ſolicitous for ſenſual pleaſures, is numerically the ſame with the principle which oppoſes that deſire; which ſometimes overcomes it, but is oftner ſurmounted by it. Now we ſhould not obſerve this unity of principle, had we really two ſpecies of ſouls, really diſtinct from one another. Should he anſwer, that one of them produces its ſenſations and paſſions in the other, I would anſwer, that here then would be, in every man, two ſubſtances, which ſhould deſire the ſame thing. But no man ever obſerved two ſuch diſtinct principles. Farther, could a material ſoul communicate a ſenſual deſire to the ſpiritual ſoul of man, the body would do it alſo; and conſequently things are multiplied without any neceſſity, by aſcribing to man a body, a ſenſitive ſoul, and a rational ſoul. But to omit theſe diſputes I ſhall take notice of another particular. Dr. Willis obſerves, that Sir Kenelm Digby was of the ſame opinion with Pereira and Des Cartes, with reſpect to the ſoul of brutes. Pereira . . . . beſtias omni cognitione, ſeu perceptione carere affirmavit; quem in nupero hoc ſeculo καθ' ὁδὸν ſequuti ſunt Viri Clariſſimi, Carteſius, Digbeius, cum aliis, qui brutorum animas, quantum fieri poſſit, ab humana diſcriminare præ ſe ferentes, eas non modò corporeas, & diviſibiles, ſed etiam merè paſſivas aſſerucrunt (111). i. e. "Pereira . . . . affirmed, "that beaſts are entirely deprived of all knowledge "or perception; and he, in this age, has been cloſely followed by the moſt illuſtrious men, Des Cartes, "Sir Kenelm Digby, and others, who, uſing their "utmoſt endeavours to diſtinguiſh the ſouls of brutes "from that of men, declared that they were not only "corporeal and diviſible, but likewiſe merely paſſive." A little after he explains the difference there is between Des Cartes and Sir Kenelm Digby, and ſhews that the latter does not take from beaſts either ſenſation or memory. He conſequently did not follow Pereira and Des Cartes: why therefore did he ſay he does? Digbeius . . . . inſuper adjecit, effluvia quædam tenuiſſima è corpore ſenſibili delibata, non modò ſenſoria exteriora afficere, verùm & interiores receſſus ſubingredientia, ſeſe ſpiritibus immiſcere, eoſque in varias fluctuationes agendo, & ſenſus & motus locales diverſimodos producere; porrò ex his atomis extrinſecis ita partes nervoſas, ac cerebrum ipſum ſubeuntibus, haud tantùm actiones extemporaneas procedere; verùm ex iiſdem in corpore ſentiente relictis, ac intra cerebri loculos reconditis, prioreſque configurationes retinentibus, rerum anteactarum ideas in memoriâ reſiduas conſtitui (112). i. e. "Sir Kenelm Digby . . . . . added "farther, . . . that ſome extremely ſubtile effluvia, "from the body perceived by ſenſe, did not only "affect the external organs, but entring into the "inward receſſes, blending with the animal ſpirits, "and raiſing different motions in them, produce, in "various manners, ſenſation as well as local motion. "Beſides, from theſe external atoms, thus entring "into the nervous parts and the brain itſelf, not "only ſudden actions, but from the ſame being "left in the ſenſitive body, and the receſſes of the "brain, and retaining their former figures, the ideas "of things paſt continuing in the memory are "formed." I will conclude, that Sir Kenelm Digby ought not to be ranked among thoſe who look upon brutes as machines. Mr. Locke has oppoſed thoſe, who will not allow brutes to be indued with reaſon. Here follows the diſtinction, according to him, between men and brutes. "This, I think, I may be "poſitive in, that the power of abſtracting is not "at all in them; and that the having of general "ideas, is that which puts a perfect diſtinction be"tween man and brutes; and is an excellency "which the faculties of brutes do by no means at"tain to. For it is evident, we obſerve no foot"ſteps in them, of making uſe of general ſigns for "univerſal ideas; from which we have reaſon to "imagine, that they have not the faculty of abſtract"ing, or making general ideas; ſince they have no "uſe of words, or any other general ſigns (113): "and therefore I think we may ſuppoſe, that it is in "this, that the ſpecies of brutes are diſcriminated "from man; and it is that proper difference wherein "they are wholly ſeparated, and which at laſt wi"dens to ſo vaſt a diſtance. For if they have any "ideas at all, and are not bare machines, (as ſome "would have them) we cannot deny them to have "ſome reaſon. It ſeems as evident to me, that they "do ſome of them in certain inſtances reaſon, as that "they have ſenſe; but it is only on particular ideas, "juſt as they received them from their ſenſes. They "are, the beſt of them, tied up within thoſe narrow "bounds, and have not (as I think) the faculty to "inlarge them by any kind of abſtraction (114)."

There is in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (115) the extract of a book, entitled, Eſſais nouveaux de Morale. It was printed at Paris in 1686. The Author, denying on one hand that brutes are indued with a ſoul capable of reaſoning, confeſſes, on the other, that their actions are directed by an external reaſon; and that this reaſon and this wiſdom, which guides them, is a more excellent and more certain wiſdom and reaſon than that of man (116). The reaſon, continues he (117), which operates in brutes, is not in them. . . . It is, as St. Thomas ſays, after all the ancient Fathers, the ſovereign and eternal reaſon of the ſupreme architect, who preſerves his works, and directs them to the ends for which he had created them, by ſecret ſprings he put in them, which are differently determined according to the occurrences, to produce a thouſand different motions, according to their reſpective wants. Add to this the following paſſage from Mr. Bernard. "Such Philoſophers as are moſt inclined to believe, "that brutes are mere machines, muſt frankly con"feſs, that they perform diverſe actions, the mecha"niſm of which it is impoſſible to explain. It would "be much ſhorter to content one's ſelf with ſaying in "general, that God, who was willing that their ma"chine ſhould ſubſiſt for ſome time, has diſpoſed, "by his infinite wiſdom, their parts agreeably to "that intention. I believe I have read ſomewhere "the following poſition, Deus eſt anima brutorum "(God is the ſoul of brutes). The expreſſion is "ſomething harſh, but a very rational explanation "may be made of it (118)." Grotius ſays, that certain acts, in which brutes abandon their particular intereſts in favour of another, proceed from an external principle. Cæterarum animantium quædam utilitatum ſuarum ſtudium, partim fœtuum ſuorum partim aliorum ſibi congenerum reſpectu, aliquatenus temperant: quod in illis quidem procedere credimus ex principio aliquo intelligente extrinſeco, quia circa actus alios, iſtis neutiquam difficiliores, par intelligentia in illis non apparet (119), i. e. "Some of the other animals abſtain, in ſome "meaſure, from what is of advantage to themſelves, "partly out of regard to their own young, and part"ly of thoſe of others of the ſame ſpecies; which "we ſuppoſe to proceed from ſome external intelli"gent principle, becauſe the like underſtanding is "not ſeen, with regard to other actions not more "difficult than theſe." Gaſpar Ziegler in his note on this paſſage, is diſpleaſed with Grotius, for not explaining clearly his thought concerning the nature of this external principle: if it be divine providence, continues he, he expoſes himſelf to the ſevere ſtrokes of Doctor Huarte (120), who ſhews that a Philoſopher ought not to explain phænomena by the immediate operation of God. He quotes two Writers, who have aſcribed to a natural inſtinct all the ſkill of brutes, and approves their opinion (121). Oſiander has taken great pains to confute Grotius, and ſays, among other particulars, that this external principle ought to be God, or an Angel, or the univerſal form of Averroes, but that none of theſe three principles ought to be admitted (122). My mentioning Averroes, puts me in mind of his admitting an external principle of human knowledge common to all particular underſtandings, and which likewiſe influences brutes and ſtones; but ſince he acknowledged that this influence had no effect on brutes and inſenſible creatures, becauſe it falls on matter ill diſpoſed, we cannot conclude, that he aſcribed more perfection to brutes than the Schoolmen. Averroes lib. 3. de anima cap. 5. unum facit omnium hominum intellectum, re ab animæ ſubſtantia ſeparatum, ſed ſingulis conjunctum per (111) Thomas Willis, ib. cap. 1. p. 5 and 6.

(112) Idem, ib. p. 7.

(113) Locke's Eſſay on Human Underſtanding, vol. 1. book 2. chap. 11. p. 120. This is an excellent work, and deſerves to be as beautifully tranſlated as it has been done by Mr. Coſte.

(114) Ibid. p. 121.

Authors who have aſcribed the actions of brutes to an external principle.

(115) For Octob. 1686. p. 1196 & ſeq.

(116) Nouveaux Eſſais de Morale, p. 30.

(117) Ibid. p. 32.

(116) Nouv. de la Republ. des Lettres, Octob. 1700. p. 419, 420.

(119) Grot. de Jure Belli & Pacis, Proleg. n. 7.

(120) Chap. 7, of the Trial of Wits.

(121) Nos omnem brutorum induſtriam ad inſtinctum referrimus naturæ, cum Sperlingio noſtro, lib. 1. Inſtit. Phyſ. cap. 6. qu. 3. & eum ſecuto Joh. Frid. Hornio de ſubject. jur. nat. c. 6. Ziegler in Prolegomena Grotii, p. 5.

(122) Oſiander, p. 48 & ſeq.

name to the remarks I ſhall make on Mr. Leibnitz's reflections [L], publiſhed in Baſnage's per inſidentes phantaſiæ imagines; etiam equo, & aſino, lapidi, & metallo, aſſiſtentem, ſed citra fructum, quia materies ſit inepta (123), i. e. "Averroes, in chap. 5. "book 3. of the ſoul, declares that the underſtanding of all men is one and the ſame, really diſtinguiſhed or ſeparated from the ſubſtance of the ſoul, "but joined to each individual man by the images "remaining in the fancy; it is likewiſe aſſiſtant to "horſes, aſſes, ſtones and metals; but has no effect, "becauſe of the unfitneſs of the ſubject." De Vigneul Marville relates (124), that there was a Philoſopher, who, in order to explain, in Rohault's conferences, how it was poſſible for brutes, being only machines, yet to act as if they had a ſoul, made uſe of Count de Gabalis's hypotheſis; and, by way of accommodation, made it ſubſervient to his purpoſe, that is, he ſuppoſed that certain elementary ſpirits make it their buſineſs to put in motion all the machines of animals, according to the laws of Mechanicks. So very ingenious a turn is given to his diſcourſe, that Mr. Pequet told the Author, that "if this agree-"able ſyſtem is not true, that at leaſt the in-"vention was pretty (125)." I don't doubt but it will pleaſe ſome perſons; but was I to diſpute upon it here, I could eaſily ſhew that it is not capable of accounting for the phænomena; and that, in certain reſpects, it is more puzzling than that of Des Cartes. The circumſtance, which perplexes the Carteſians moſt, is not to ſay that brutes move with great readineſs a thouſand different ways; but in ſaying that they give various tokens of friendſhip, hatred, joy, jealouſy, fear, grief, &c. The ſyſtem of theſe elementary ſpirits is of no uſe towards explaining this, ſince it is pretended that the only motive of their ſetting the ſprings of brutes in motion, is to amuſe themſelves agreeably. They therefore would not be ſo ſtupid as to render themſelves obnoxious to the ſenſations of hunger or cold, or to the pain which ariſes from the blow of a ſtick, &c. One muſt therefore ſuppoſe, that none of theſe paſſions are found in brutes, in which caſe all the difficulties would again occur; or one muſt ſay, that theſe ſpirits are ſentenced to direct the machines of brutes, to expiate their ſins, by ſuffering all the paſſions which the Peripateticks aſcribe to brutes, which is contrary to the ſuppoſition of Count de Gabalis. I paſs over ſeveral other difficulties as conſiderable as theſe, which may be objected to this ſyſtem, whoſe invention was ſaid to be pretty.

(123) Voſſius, de origine & progreſſu Idol. lib. 3. cap. 42. p. m. 952.

(124) Melanges d'Hiſtoire & de Litterature, Tom. 1. p. 100 & ſeq. Roan edit. 1700.

(125) Ibid. p. 106.

Authors who have aſſerted, that brutes are but machines, or have aſſerted the contrary doctrine.

We find by the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (126), that Mr. Vallade, Author of a philoſophical diſcourſe on the creation and diſpoſition or frame of the world, has explained, by mechanical laws, the moſt ſurprizing actions of animals. We find by the ſame journal (137), that Mr. de la Bruyere has been cenſured for aſſerting, that brutes are nothing but matter. In a beautiful work of Father Francis Lami (126) on the knowledge of man's ſelf, is an illuſtration (129), in which the Author ſhews, that we have no ſolid reaſon to aſcribe knowledge or immortality to the ſoul of brutes; whereas we cannot reaſonably deny either of them to the ſoul of man. This illuſtration is worth reading; and particularly becauſe we therein find the ſolution of the moſt perplexing difficulty in the ſyſtem of machines; for the Author ſhews, that every man may prove to himſelf, by very ſtrong reaſons, that the reſt of mankind are not mere machines; and yet this is what the Anti-Carteſians endeavour to infer, from this poſition, viz. that brutes would conſiſt of ſuch well diſpoſed organs, that they might do, without knowledge, all we ſee them do. If God (is it replied) could frame ſuch a machine, he alſo could frame others which would perform all the actions of man; and conſequently we could be certain of nothing but our own thought, and ſhould doubt whether any other perſons but ourſelves think. Father Giſbert, Regius Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Toulouſe, is one of thoſe who publiſhed books againſt the opinion of the Carteſians, with regard to the ſoul of brutes (130). I am to obſerve that this opinion was maintained in a courſe of philoſophy taught (131) at Paris in the College of the four Na-

(126) For Octob. 1700. p. 419.

(127) For April 1701. p. 433 & ſeq.

(128) A Benedictine, of the congregation of St. Maur.

(129) Tom. 5. p. 526 & ſeq. Paris edit. 1698.

(130) See Journ. des Savans, January 16, 1690. p. 49. Dutch edit.

(131) By Mr. Pourchot.

tions, and afterwards printed in the ſame city in 1695, with this title, Inſtitutio Philoſophica ad faciliorem veterum ac recentiorum Philoſophorum lectionum comparata; and conſiſts of four volumes in 12mo. The third tome from page 271 to page 292 relates to the ſenſitive ſoul. I do not doubt but Mr. Bayle, Doctor of Phyſic and Profeſſor of the Liberal Arts at Toulouſe, has embraced, on this head, the Carteſian ſyſtem, in his Phyſicks lately publiſhed by him in three volumes in 4to. (132).

I could write a long Supplement concerning what I ſaid (133) of the opinion of Mr. Poiret, but I chooſe rather to omit it, and only point out a Writer (134), who has collected a great number of learned particulars, with regard to the Platonic doctrine concerning the æthereal ſubſtance, which attends ſouls when they enter, as well as when they leave the body.

[L] To the remarks I ſhall make on Mr. Leibnitz's reflections.] I ſhall begin by declaring, that I am extremely pleaſed with myſelf, on account of the little difficulties I propoſed againſt the ſyſtem of that great Philoſopher, ſince they occaſioned anſwers, which have made that ſubject clearer to me; and given me a more diſtinct idea of what ought to be admired in it. I now conſider this new ſyſtem as an important conqueſt, which enlarges the bounds of philoſophy. We had but two hypotheſes, that of the Schools and that of the Carteſians; the one was the way of influence of the body on the ſoul, and of the ſoul on the body; and the other, the way of aſſiſtance, or occaſional cauſality. But here we have a new acquiſition, which we may call, with Father Lami, a pre-eſtabliſhed way of harmony (135) We owe it to Mr. Leibnitz; and nothing can be thought on, which gives ſo exalted an idea of the underſtanding and power of the Author of all things. This, added to the advantage of ſetting aſide all notions of miraculous conduct, would induce me to prefer this new ſyſtem to that of the Carteſians, could I conceive ſome poſſibility in the way of pre-eſtabliſhed harmony. I deſire it may be obſerved, that though I confeſs that this way removes all notions of a miraculous conduct, I yet do not recant what I formerly ſaid, that the ſyſtem of occaſional cauſes does not bring in God acting after a miraculous way (136). I am as much perſuaded as ever, that an action cannot be miraculous, unleſs God produces it as an exception to the general laws; and that every thing he is immediately the Author of, according to thoſe laws, is diſtinct from a miracle properly ſo called. But being willing to cut off from this diſpute as many things as I poſſibly can, I will agree to have it ſaid, that the moſt certain way to remove all the notions which include a miracle, is, to ſuppoſe that the created ſubſtances are immediately the cauſes of the effects of nature. I therefore ſhall omit what I might reply to that part of Mr. Leibnitz's objection. I alſo ſhall wave all the objections which are not more repugnant to his opinion, than to that of ſome other Philoſophers. I therefore ſhall not take notice of the difficulties, which oppoſe the ſuppoſition, that a creature may receive from God the power of moving itſelf. Theſe difficulties are great, and almoſt inſurmountable (137); but the ſyſtem of Mr. Leibnitz does not lye more open to them than that of the Peripateticks; and I cannot, ſay whether the Carteſians would preſume to aſſert, that God cannot communicate to our ſoul a power of acting. If they ſay it, how can they confeſs that Adam ſinned? And if they dare not ſay it, they weaken the reaſons by which they attempt to prove, that matter is not ſuſceptible of any ſort of activity. I alſo do not believe, that it would be more difficult for Mr. Leibnitz, than for the Carteſians or other Philoſophers, to free himſelf from the objection of a fatal mechaniſm, which overthrows human liberty. Waving therefore this, I ſhall ſpeak only of what is peculiar to the ſyſtem of pre-eſtabliſhed harmony.

I. My firſt obſervation is, that it raiſes, above the utmoſt height of our conceptions, the power and underſtanding of the divine art. Figure to yourſelf a ſhip, (132) See the extract of the I, in the Nouv. de la Republ. des Lettres, Feb. 1701. p. 209 & ſeq. which gives a great character of this work.

(133) Rem. [H] above.

(134) Renatus Vallinus, ad Librum 3 Boetii de Conſolatione Philoſophiæ, p. 62 & ſeq.

(135) Dom Francis Lami, Traite 2 de la Conoiſſance de ſoi-meme, p. 226. edit. of 1699.

(136) See the piece inſerted by Leibnitz, in l'Hiſt des Ouvrages des Savans, July 1698. p. 334.

(137) See Sturmius, Tom. 1. of his Phyſica electiva ſive hypothetica, (an extract of which is given in the Acta eruditorum, 1697. p. 474 & ſeq.) and in the little piece he inſerted in the Acta eruditor. 1699. p. 208 & ſeq. by way of anſwer to a piece of Mr. Leibnitz, inſerted in the Acta eruditor. 1698. p. 427 & ſeq.

nage's Journal; theſe remarks being a natural and neceſſary conſequence of a paſſage of ſhip, which, though devoid of any ſenſation or knowledge, and without being directed by any created or increated Being, has the power of moving itſelf ſo very ſeaſonably, that it ſhall always have the wind favourable, ſhall ſhun ſwelling ſeas and rocks, ſhall caſt anchor whenever it be neceſſary, and retire into the harbour whenever it may be proper: ſuppoſe that ſuch a ſhip ſails in this manner ſeveral years together, for ever turned and ſituated in a due manner with regard to the change of the air, and the different ſituation of ſeas and lands; you will confeſs that God's infinity is not too great to communicate ſuch a power to a ſhip, and will even ſay, that the nature of the ſhip is ſuch as not to be capable of receiving ſuch a virtue from God. Nevertheleſs, what Mr. Leibnitz ſuppoſes concerning the mechaniſm of the human body, is more wonderful and ſurprizing than all this. I will now apply to Cæſar his ſyſtem of the union of body and ſoul.

II. It muſt be ſaid, according to this ſyſtem, the body of Julius Cæſar exerciſed its moving faculty in ſuch a manner, that, from his birth to his death he went through perpetual changes, which anſwered with the utmoſt exactneſs to the perpetual changes of a certain ſoul, which he did not know, and which made no impreſſion upon him. We muſt ſay that the rule, according to which that faculty of Cæſar's body was to produce its acts, would go to the Senate on ſuch a day, at ſuch an hour, that he would there have ſpoke ſuch and ſuch words, &c. even though it had pleaſed God to annihilate Cæſar's ſoul, the day after it was created. We muſt ſay that this moving faculty changed and modified itſelf perpetually, according to the volubility of the thoughts of that ambitious ſpirit; and gave itſelf directly ſuch a ſituation rather than another, becauſe Cæſar's ſoul paſſed from a certain thought to another. Can a blind power modify itſelf ſo exactly in conſequence of an impreſſion communicated thirty or forty years before; which was never renewed before, and which is abandoned to itſelf, without its ever knowing what it has to do? Is not this much more incomprehenſible than the voyage I mentioned in the preceding paragraph?

III. A circumſtance which increaſes the difficulty is, that the human machine contains an almoſt numberleſs multitude of organs, and is perpetually expoſed to the ſhock of the bodies that ſurround it (138); and which, by a numberleſs multitude of ſhakings, excite in it a thouſand ſorts of modifications. How will it be poſſible to conceive, that there will never happen any diſorder or confuſion in this pre-eſtabliſhed harmony; but that it ſhall always go through its courſe, during the longeſt life of man, notwithſtanding the infinite varieties of the reciprocal action of ſo many organs on one another, ſurrounded on all ſides with a numberleſs multitude of particles, ſometimes hot, and at other times cold, ſometimes wet, and at other times dry; always active, and for ever ſtimulating the nerves one way or other. I will take it for granted, that the multiplicity of organs and external agents, may be a neceſſary inſtrument of the almoſt infinite variety of changes in the human body; but can that variety have ſuch an exactneſs as is required here? Will it never diſturb the correſpondence between theſe changes and thoſe of the ſoul? This ſeems to be quite impoſſible.

IV. It will be to no purpoſe to have recourſe to God's power, to maintain that brutes are mere machines; it would be in vain to repreſent, that God was able to contrive machines ſo artfully, that a man's voice, the reflected light of an object, &c. will ſtrike them exactly where it is neceſſary, in order that they may move after a certain manner. All people, part of the Carteſians excepted, reject this ſuppoſition; and no Carteſian would admit it, ſhould it be extended to man; that is, ſhould it be aſſerted that God could form bodies, to ſet bounds to the power and knowledge of God; I only mean, that the nature of things does not admit that the faculties communicated to the creature, ſhould neceſſarily be without certain limitations. The actions of creatures muſt neceſſarily be proportioned to their eſſential ſtate, and performed agreeably to the character that ſuits with every machine; for according to the axiom of the Philoſophers (139), whatever is received is proportioned to the capacity of the thing which receives it. We conſequently may reject Mr. Leibnitz's hypotheſis as impoſſible, ſince it is ſurrounded with greater difficulties than that of the Automata. It ſuppoſes a perpetual harmony between two ſubſtances which do not act upon one another. But were ſervants machines, and ſhould punctually obey all their maſter's commands, it could not be ſaid that they did it without a real action of the maſter upon themſelves; for he would ſpeak ſome words, and make ſigns, which would really ſhake the organs of the ſervants.

V. Let us now conſider the ſoul of Cæſar, and we ſhall find it ſurrounded with ſtill greater impoſſibilities. This ſoul was in the world without being expoſed to the influence of any ſpirit. The ſtrength it had received from God was the only principle of the particular actions it produced every moment; and if thoſe actions differed from one other, it was not becauſe ſome were produced by the concourſe of ſome ſprings, which did not contribute to the production of the reſt, for the ſoul of man is ſimple, indiviſible, and immaterial. Mr. Leibnitz owns this; and in caſe he did not own it, but on the contrary ſuppoſed with moſt Philoſophers, and with ſome of the moſt excellent Metaphyſicians of the age (140), that a being compoſed of ſeveral material particles, diſpoſed after a certain manner, is capable of thinking; I ſhould conſider his hypotheſis as abſolutely impoſſible upon that very account; and I could refute it a great many other ways, of which I have no occaſion in this place, ſince he acknowledges the immateriality of our ſouls, and builds upon it. To return to the ſoul of Julius Cæſar, let us call it an immaterial Automata (141), and compare it with one of Epicurus's atoms, I mean an atom ſurrounded with a vacuum on all ſides, and which ſhould never meet with any other atom. The compariſon is very juſt; for on one hand, this atom has a natural power of moving itſelf; exerts it without any foreign aid, and without being retarded or traverſed by any thing; and on the other hand, Cæſar's ſoul is a ſpirit, which has received a faculty of producing thoughts, and exerts it without the influence of any other ſpirit or body. Nothing either aſſiſts or oppoſes it. If we conſult the common notions, and the ideas of order, we ſhall find that this atom muſt never ſtop; and that being moved the preceding moment, it muſt move in the preſent moment, and all the following ones, and that the manner of its motion muſt always be the ſame. This is the conſequence of an axiom approved by Mr. Leibnitz; Since a thing always remains in the ſtate it is once in, if nothing happens which obliges it to change (142), ... we conclude, ſays he (143), not only that a body which is at reſt will be always ſo; but alſo that a body which is in motion, will always keep that motion or change, that is the ſame celerity or direction, if nothing intervenes which may prevent it. Every one knows very clearly, that this atom, whether it moves by an innate power, as was affirmed by Democritus and Epicurus, or moves by a power with which the Creator indued it, will always advance in an uniform manner, and equally in the ſame line, and never turn to the right or left, or go back. Epicurus was laughed at, when he invented the motion of declination (144); it was a needleſs ſuppoſition, to extricate himſelf from the labyrinth of the fatal neceſſity of all things; and could not aſſign any reaſon for this new part of his hypotheſis. It claſhed with the moſt evident notions of our mind; for it is plain that an atom, which ſhall have deſcribed a right line during two days, cannot divert its way at the beginning of the third, unleſs it meets with ſome obſtacle, muſt have a mind to go out of its way, or contain ſome ſpring, which begins to play that inſtant. The firſt of theſe reaſons cannot be admitted in a vacuum. The ſecond is impoſſible, ſince an atom has not the power of thinking; and the third is abſolutely impoſſible in a particle or atom that is a perfect

(138) Obſerve, that, according to Leibnitz, that which is active in every ſubſtance, is a thing that ought to be reduced to a true unity. As therefore the body of every man is compoſed of ſeveral ſubſtances, every one of them muſt have a principle of action, really diſtinct from the principle of every one of the reſt. He declares that the action of every principle muſt be ſpontaneous. Now this muſt vary their effects infinitely, and confound them; for the ſhock of neighbouring bodies, muſt put ſome conſtraint on the natural ſpontaneity of each.

(139) Quidquid recipitur, ad modum recipientis recipitur.

(140) Mr. Locke, for inſtance.

(141) Mr. Leibnitz employs this expreſſion, in his piece inſerted in l'Hiſt. des Ouv. des Savans, for July 1698. p. 338. The ſoul, ſays he, is a moſt perfect immaterial automaton.

(142) Memoire, inſerted in l'Hiſt. des Ouv. des Savans, for July 1698. p. 331.

(143) Mr. Leibnitz declares he aſſents to the axiom; nay, I aſſert, adds he, that it is favourable to me, as indeed it is one of the things I build upon.

(144) See the art. EPICUR. rem. [U].

of the firſt edition of this article. I hope they will prove an occaſion of clearing up a ſubject a perfect unity. I muſt now make ſome uſe of all this.

VI. The ſoul of Cæſar is a being to which unity belongs in a ſtrict ſenſe. The faculty of producing thoughts is a property of its own nature (145); and it received this faculty from God, both with regard to poſſeſſion and exertion. If the firſt thought it gives itſelf is a ſenſation of pleaſure, I do not ſee why the ſecond thought ſhall not alſo be a ſenſation of pleaſure; for when the total cauſe of an effect continues the ſame, the effect cannot change. Now the ſoul, the ſecond inſtant of its exiſtence, does not receive a new faculty of thinking, only retains the faculty it was indued with the firſt inſtant, and is as independent from the concourſe of any other cauſe, in the ſecond inſtant as the firſt; it muſt therefore reproduce the ſecond inſtant or moment the ſame thought it had before produced. If it be objected, that it muſt be in a ſtate of change, and would not be ſo in the caſe I ſuppoſed, I anſwer that its change will be like the change of an atom; for an atom, which moves continually in the ſame line, acquires every inſtant a new ſituation, which however is like to the preceding ſituation. A ſoul may therefore continue in its ſtate of changing, if it gives itſelf a new thought like to the preceding. But if we do not ſuppoſe it to be ſo much confined, and allow it a change of thoughts, it yet muſt be granted, at leaſt, that the tranſition from one thought to another includes ſome reaſon of affinity. If I ſuppoſe that, on a certain inſtant, Cæſar's ſoul ſees a tree with fruits and flowers, I can conceive (146), that it may immediately wiſh to ſee one that has only leaves, and afterwards one that has only flowers; and in this manner, that it will form to itſelf ſeveral images, which will ariſe one from the other; but we cannot apprehend the poſſibility of ſuch odd thoughts as are ſo common in the mind of man; thoughts which have ſo little affinity to, and are ſo very contrary to one another. We cannot conceive that God could indue the ſoul of Julius Cæſar with the principle I am going to take notice of. He doubtleſs pricked himſelf more than once with a pin whilſt he was ſucking: and therefore, according to the hypotheſis I am here examining, his ſoul muſt have produced a ſenſation of pain, immediately after the agreeable ſenſations ariſing from the ſweetneſs of the milk, which it had enjoyed two or three minutes together. By what ſpring was it determined to interrupt its pleaſures, and to give itſelf up on a ſudden to a ſenſation of pain, without receiving any intimation of preparing itſelf for change, and without receiving any new alteration in its ſubſtance? If we read the life of this firſt Roman Emperor, a ſtronger objection than this will occur every inſtant.

VII. This would be more comprehenſible, if we ſuppoſed that man's ſoul is not a ſpirit, but rather a legion of ſpirits, every one of which has its functions, which begin and end exactly as the changes wrought in a human body declare. In conſequence of this we muſt ſay, that ſomething analogous to a great number of wheels and ſprings, or of matters which ferment, diſpoſed according to the changes of our machine, awakes or lulls to ſleep, for a certain time, the action of each of thoſe ſpirits; but in this caſe, the ſoul of man would no longer be one ſubſtance, but ens per aggregationem, a heap and collection of ſubſtances, like to material beings. We here ſeek for a ſingle being, which may form, at one time, joy, at another time, grief, &c. We do not ſearch for ſeveral beings, one of which may produce hope, another deſpair, &c.

In the above-mentioned obſervations, I have only explained thoſe, which Mr. Leibnitz did me the honour to examine. I ſhall now make ſome reflections on his anſwers.

VIII. He ſays (147), that the law of the change, which happens in the ſubſtance of the animal, tranſports it from pleaſure to pain, the inſtant that a ſolution of continuity is made in its body; becauſe the law of the indiviſible ſubſtance of that animal is to repreſent what is done in its body, in the manner we experience it; and even to repreſent, in ſome meaſure, and with reſpect to that body, whatever is done in the world. Theſe words are a very good explication of the foundations of this ſyſtem: they are, as it were, the unravelling of, and key to it; but, at the ſame time, they are the very things, to which all the objections, made by thoſe who look upon this new hypotheſis as impoſſible, are levelled. The law we ſpeak of ſuppoſes a decree of God, and ſhews wherein this ſyſtem agrees with that of occaſional cauſes. Theſe two ſyſtems unite in the following point; that there are laws, according to which the ſoul of man muſt repreſent what is done in the body of man, as we experience it. But they diſagree as to the manner of executing theſe laws. The Carteſians ſay, that God puts them in execution; but Mr. Leibnitz affirms, that the ſoul itſelf executes them. But I look upon this as impoſſible; the ſoul not having the inſtruments neceſſary for ſuch an execution. Now, how infinite ſoever the knowledge and power of God may be, he cannot perform, by a machine deſtitute of a certain piece, what requires the concourſe of ſuch a piece. He muſt be obliged to ſupply that defect; and, in this caſe, it would be himſelf, and not the machine, which had produced that effect. I will now ſhew, that the ſoul is not indued with the inſtruments neceſſary for the execution of the divine law mentioned to us, and will employ a compariſon for that purpoſe.

Let us figure to ourſelves an animal created by God, and appointed by him to ſing continually. It is certain he will always ſing; but if God allots him a certain muſick-book, he muſt neceſſarily either ſet it before his eyes, imprint it on his memory, or give ſuch a formation to his muſcles, that, according to the laws of Mechanicks, one certain note will always come after the other, exactly, purſuant to the order of the muſick-book. We cannot conceive, without this, that the animal in queſtion will ever be able to follow the whole ſeries of notes, as ſet down by the Creator of all things. Let us apply the like plan to man's ſoul. Mr. Leibnitz is of opinion, that it not only received the faculty of induing itſelf inceſſantly with thoughts, but likewiſe the faculty of following always a certain order of thoughts, which may correſpond to the perpetual changes of the machine of the body. This ſeries or order of thoughts is like the muſick-book ſet before the ſinging animal abovementioned. Can the ſoul change its perceptions every inſtant, or its modifications according to this tablature or book of thoughts, without knowing the ſeries of the notes, and thinking actually on them? Now experience ſhews that it knows nothing of them. Were it not neceſſary, at leaſt, that in default of ſuch a knowledge, there ſhould be a ſeries of particular inſtruments, each of which might be a neceſſary cauſe of ſuch and ſuch a thought? Muſt they not be diſpoſed in ſuch a manner, as that one might operate exactly after the other, according to the correſpondence pre-eſtabliſhed between the changes of the machine of the body, and the thoughts of the ſoul? But it is very certain, that an immaterial, ſimple and indiviſible ſubſtance cannot be compoſed of ſuch a numberleſs multitude of particular inſtruments, placed one before the other, according to the order of the tablature in queſtion; and conſequently the human ſoul cannot poſſibly execute that law.

Mr. Leibnitz (148) ſuppoſes, that the ſoul does not diſtinctly know its future perceptions, but that it perceives them confuſedly; and that there is in every ſubſtance, traces of every thing that have happened, and will happen to it (149): but this numberleſs multitude of perceptions prevents our diſtinguiſhing them. . . . . The preſent ſtate of every ſubſtance is a natural conſequence of its preceding ſtate. . . . (150) The ſoul, notwithſtanding its ſimplicity, has always a ſenſation compoſed of ſeveral perceptions at one and the ſame time; which anſwers our purpoſe, as well as if it was compoſed of parts, like a machine. For every preceding perception influences thoſe which follow, agreeable to a law of order, which is in perceptions as well as in motions. . . (151) As the perceptions which are found together in the ſame ſoul, at the ſame time, include a numberleſs multitude of ſmall undiſtinguiſhable ſenſations, which muſt afterwards be unfolded, (145) This is according to Mr. Leibnitz's ſyſtem.

(146) I ſpeak of this by way of conceſſion, that is, I will not take even advantage of the reaſons which prevent our believing, that a created ſpirit can give itſelf ideas.

(147) Leibnitz, Memoire inſerted in l'Hiſt. des Ouv. des Savans, July 1698. p. 332.

(148) Leibnitz, ibid. p. 337.

(149) We cannot conceive this in an indiviſible, ſimple and immaterial ſubſtance.

(150) Ibid. p. 339, 340.

(151) Ibid. p. 340.

ject equally difficult and important.

folded, we muſt not wonder at the infinite variety of what is to reſult from it, in time. This is only a repreſentative conſequence of the ſoul, which muſt expreſs what paſſes, and even what will happen in its body; and, in ſome meaſure, in all the reſt, by the connexion and correſpondence of all the parts of the world. I have not much to reply to this. I only ſay that this ſuppoſition, when once well explained, will be the true way of reſolving all theſe difficulties. Mr. Leibnitz, by means of the penetration of his exalted genius, has very well conceived the whole compaſs and force of this objection, and in what manner the chief inconveniency ought to be remedied. I am perſuaded that he will ſmooth the rougheſt parts of his ſyſtem, and inform us of ſome excellent particulars concerning the nature of ſpirits. No man is able to travel to more advantage, or more ſafety than he in the intellectual world. I hope his noble illuſtrations will remove all the impoſſibilities, which hitherto have occurred to my imagination; and that he will ſolve, in the moſt ſolid manner, my difficulties, as well as thoſe of Father Francis Lami (152); and it is theſe hopes that made me ſay, without a compliment, that his ſyſtem ought to be conſidered as an important conqueſt (153).

He will not be much puzzled by this, viz. that whereas, according to the ſuppoſition of the Carteſians, there is but one general law for the union of all ſpirits with bodies; he will have it, that God gives to every ſpirit a particular law; the reſult of which ſeems to be, that the primitive conſtitution of every ſpirit is ſpecifically different from all others (154). Do not the Thomiſts ſay, that there are as many ſpecies as individuums in the nature of angels?

(152) They are in treatiſe 2, of la Conoiſſance de ſoimeme, from p. 225, to p. 243, Paris edit. 1699.

(153) Beginning of the rem. [L] above.

(154) No two men ever had the ſame thoughts; I don't ſay for a month together, but not even for two minutes. The principle of thought muſt therefore have a particular rule and nature in each.

(a) See Jean Leger, Hiſt. des Egliſes Vaudoiſes, part 1. p. 144. and p. 173, where he ſays the memoirs were printed in 1645.

(b) See the rem. [A].

RORENCO ((MARCO AURELIO), one of the joint Lords of the Valley of Lucerne, and Grand Prior of St. Roc at Turin, was a great perſecutor of the Waldenſes in the 17th Century [A]. He alſo wrote the following books againſt them [B], Narratione dell' introduttione delle Hereſie nelle Valli de Piemonte, printed at Turin in 1632, and Memorie Hiſtoriche dell' introduttione delle Hereſie, printed in the ſame city anno 1649, and dedicated to the Duke of Savoy (a). He was born in the Valley of Lucerne, was ſon to Count John Baptiſt Rorenco (b), and was living in 1668 (c).

(c) See the ſame rem.

ROS-

[A] Was a great perſecutor of the Waldenſes in the 17th century.] Peter Gilles, in his hiſtory of the Proteſtant churches of Piedmont, having ſpoke of the famine in 1628, adds as follows. The adverſaries of the Proteſtant churches in the Vallies, who are always watching for ſome opportunity to perſecute them, choſe that of the famine, hoping it would ſerve them as a net to fiſh, and draw into them the poor famiſhed people; and among thoſe who exerted themſelves in a particular manner, were the abovementioned Monk Bonaventure, and Marco Aurelio Rorenco, Prior of Lucerne, ſon to one of the Gentlemen of the Valley, who, having ſtudied the law, turned Prieſt, and travelling to Rome, was appointed Prior of Lucerne, and poſſeſſor of the revenues of the ſaid priory: but this (as was publiſhed even by thoſe of his own party) was for his having promiſed at Rome and elſewhere, to uſe all his power and abilities to promote the Romiſh religion in the Vallies; and there aboliſh, at leaſt reſtrain, that of the Proteſtants; and even before he was returned from his journey to Rome, ſome of the Proteſtants were credibly informed, that the Prior, for the aforeſaid purpoſe, had propoſed, and concluded to build new convents in the Valley of Lucerne, and in ſome other places; and, in others, to build manſions for ſome Friers, and to perform other matters of this kind, which he a little after endeavoured, to the utmoſt of his power, to bring about. In the firſt place, he prevailed with Count John Baptiſt Rorenco his father, living at la Tour, to ſell his houſe, and the adjoining buildings, to turn them into a monaſtery, there to lodge a ſeminary of Monks called Franciſcans, reformed minims. And the 23d of June of the aboveſaid year 1628, he conducted them thither, accompanied by Frier Bonaventure, and ſeveral other Monks and Prieſts; and immediately after they ſent thither all ſuch proviſions as the Monks might have occaſion for themſelves, and to purchaſe the conſciences of the poor famiſhed people; and they began to beſtow very liberally to ſuch few Papiſts as remained at la Tour, even to ſome who had little need of them, to make the neighbouring Proteſtants deſirous of going to them, and ſaying, what will you give me, and I will do whatever you deſire. But ſeeing none come, they invited them by their Papiſts, wherein was particularly diligent Lady Catharine, the ſaid Prior's mother, who uſed to go from houſe to houſe, exhorting the poorer and weaker ſort of people, to go and accept the great charity which the neighbouring Fathers had prepared for them (1).

(1) Peter Gilles, Hiſt. Eccleſ. des Egliſes Vaudoiſes, p. 473, 474.

Another Hiſtorian of the churches of the Vallies ſays, that the great Prior Rorenco is their great perſecutor, and member of the Council de extirpandis hæreticis (2), for extirpating Hereticks, ... being looked upon, by the Court of Rome, as the moſt diligent, the moſt ſubtle, and the moſt effectual inſtrument they could have met with in this age, to haraſs thoſe poor people of the Vallies; and the man who was beſt ſkilled in contriving deſigns, and other methods to ruin them, as being grown old in this ſtudy, for he is now decrepit (3).

(2) Jean Leger, Hiſt. des Egliſes Vaudoiſes, part. 1. p. 155. He ſays that Rorenco is ſtill living; and the dedication of his book is dated the 1ſt of May, 1669.

(3) Hiſt. des Egliſes Vaudoiſes, p. 173.

[B] He alſo wrote . . . . books againſt them.] Peter Gilles having told us (4), that in 1610, a book was publiſhed, entitled, Vittoria triomphale, written by Samuel de Caſſini, a Franciſcan, and which aſperſed the Waldenſes, adds, "We find much to the ſame "purpoſe, in the book entitled, Breve narratione, of "the preſent Prior of Lucerne, printed in 1632; and "calculated purpoſely to aſperſe the religion and "manners of the Proteſtants of the Vallies, and filled "with falſities and impudent calumnies, with the "following preamble, You ſay, you do; and there are "ſtill ſome perſons living, who remember that your fa-"thers did ſuch and ſuch things. But finding afterwards that violent complaints were made of his "ſlanders; and that he was aſked in good earneſt "the proofs of what he had writ; and particularly "to produce the living witneſſes of certain iniquities "committed in paſt times; as he did not know "where to have them, he printed another piece in "1634, entitled, Lettre Apologetique, (an Apologeti-"cal Letter) in which he declares, that he never in-"tended to aſperſe the Proteſtants of the Vallies; and "that what he had writ down in his book were only "relations of what ſome Authors had writ concerning "certain vices, which had prevailed, in times paſt, in "many places. But to prevent his being again ſurpriſed, he was very careful not to name the pretended Authors, and places and times." The Churches of the Waldenſes appointed Valere Gros, Miniſter of the church of Villar, to anſwer this Prior's firſt book (5), which anſwer was not publiſhed; but as to the anſwer made to the ſecond book, it was publiſhed; and a general account of it is given in the Hiſtorian whom I quoted (6). See the art. GILLES (PETER).

(4) Ibid. p. 13.

(5) Ibid. p. 539.

(6) Ibid. p. 540 & ſeq.

§ (a) He is no leſs ſo with reſpect to Dr. Francis le Picart, who alſo is one of his heroes, if it be true what we are told concerning this man, viz. that being in the pulpit the 25th of November 1553, after having railed, according to cuſtom, againſt the newly converted Lutherans, he proceeded ſo far as to ſay, that the King ought, for ſome time, to feign himſelf to be a Lutheran among them, in order that they, being thereby emboldened to aſſemble publickly in all places, they might be cut to pieces, and the Kingdom be at once purged of them. See the Anatomy of the Maſs, &c. tranſlated from the Italian of Antonio Adamo, page 538, printed by J. Martin, 1562. By the way, who knows whether ſome of thoſe had not been at this ſermon, who, nineteen years after, adviſed Charles IX. to the Paris maſſacre? REM. CRIT.]

[A] Son

☞ ROSCOMMON (WENTWORTH DILLON, EARL OF), was deſcended of an ancient family in Ireland, and was ſon of James Dillon Earl of Roſcommon in that Kingdom [A], where his ſon Wentworth, who is the ſubject of this article, was born, when that Kingdom was under the Adminiſtration of the firſt Earl of Strafford, to whom his Lordſhip's mother (deſcended from the Boyntons of Bramſton in Yorkſhire) was nearly related; and when he was baptiſed, the Lord Lieutenant gave him the ſirname of his own family Wentworth (a). He paſſed the firſt years of his infancy in Ireland, and was educated in the Proteſtant Religion. The Earl of Strafford afterwards ſent for him over into England [B], and placed him at his own ſeat in Yorkſhire, under the tuition of Dr. Hall, afterwards Biſhop of Norwich, a perſon of eminent learning and piety. By him he was inſtructed in Latin, and without learning the common rules of Grammar, which he could never retain in his memory, he attained to write in that language with claſſical elegance and propriety, and with ſo much eaſe, that he choſe it to correſpond with thoſe friends, who had learning ſufficient to ſupport the Commerce. When the cloud began to gather over England, and the Earl of Strafford was impeached, by the advice of the Lord Primate Uſher he was ſent to complete his education at Caen in Normandy under the famous Monſieur Bochart. After ſome years he travelled to Rome, where he grew familiar with the moſt valuable remains of antiquity, applying himſelf particularly to the knowledge of medals, which he gained to perfection, and ſpoke Italian with ſo much grace and fluency, that he was frequently miſtaken for a native. Soon after the Reſtoration he returned to England, where he was graciouſly received by King Charles II. and made Captain of the Band of Penſioners. In the gaieties of that age he was tempted to indulge a violent paſſion for gaming, by which he frequently hazarded his life in duels, and exceeded the bounds of a moderate fortune. A diſpute with the Lord Privy Seal, about part of his eſtate, obliging him to reviſit his native country, he reſigned his poſt in the Engliſh Court; and ſoon after his arrival at Dublin, the Duke of Ormonde appointed him Captain of the Guards (b). Mrs. Katharine Phillips in a letter to Sir Charles Cotterel dated at Dublin Oct. 19 1662 (c), ſtyles him a very ingenious perſon, of excellent natural parts, and certainly the moſt hopeful young Nobleman in Ireland. However, he ſtill retained his exceſſive paſſion for gaming, which engaged him in the following adventure. As he returned to his lodgings from a gaming-table, he was attacked in the dark by three ruffians, who were employed to aſſaſſinate him. The Earl defended himſelf with ſo much reſolution, that he diſpatched one of the aggreſſors, whilſt a Gentleman, accidentally paſſing that way, interpoſed, and diſarmed another; the third ſecured himſelf by flight. This generous aſſiſtant was a diſbanded officer of a good family and fair reputation, but whoſe circumſtances were ſuch, that he wanted even a plain ſuit of clothes to make a decent appearance at the Caſtle. But his Lordſhip on this occaſion preſenting him to the Duke of Ormonde, prevailed with his Grace that he might reſign his poſt of Captain of the Guards to his friend; which for about three years the Gentleman enjoyed, and upon his death the Duke returned the Commiſſion to his generous benefactor. The pleaſures of the Engliſh Court and the friendſhips he had there contracted, were powerful motives for his return to London. Soon after he came, he was made Maſter of the Horſe to the Dutcheſs of York, and married the Lady Frances, eldeſt daughter of Richard Earl of Burlington, who before had been the wife of Colonel Courtney. Here he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his writings [C], and about this time, in imitation of thoſe learned and polite aſſemblies with which he had been acquainted abroad, he began to form a ſociety for the refining and fixing the ſtandard of our language, in which his great friend Mr. Dryden was a principal aſſiſtant. This project was entirely defeated by the religious commotions, which enſued on (a) Mr. Fenton's Obſervations on ſome of Mr. Waller's Poems, p. 133, 134. edit. London 1730.

(b) Ibid. p. 134, 135.

(c) See Letters of Orinda to Poliarchus, p. 79. edit. Lond. 1705.

[A] Son of James Dillon, Earl of Roſcommon, in that Kingdom.] This Nobleman, when he was very young, was converted from the Roman Catholick religion by Dr. Uſher, Archbiſhop of Armagh, and was ſent to England, and committed to the care of Dr. George Hakewell, who, finding him to be a youth of excellent parts, placed him in Exeter college in Oxford, in the beginning of the year 1628, under the care of Laurence Bodley, B. D. nephew to Sir Thomas Bodley. In this college he continued ſeveral years, and afterwards returned to his own country (1).

(1) Wood, Faſti Oxon, vol. 2. col. 223. 2d edit.

[B] The Earl of Strafford afterwards ſent for him over into England.] Mr. Fenton tells us (2), that Lord Roſcommon's father having been converted by Archbiſhop Uſher, from the communion of the church of Rome, the Earl of Strafford, apprehending, that his family would be expoſed to the moſt furious effects of religious revenge, at the beginning of the Iriſh rebellion ſent for his godſon into England. But this paſſage contains a very groſs miſtake, ſince the Earl of Strafford was beheaded on the 12th of May 1641, whereas the Iriſh rebellion did not break out till the latter end of October following.

(2) Obſervations on ſome of Mr. Waller's Poems, p. 134.

[C] His writings.] I. An Eſſay on tranſlated verſe, London 1680 and 1684, 4to. To which are prefixed commendatory verſes by Mr. Dryden, and his ſon Charles Dryden, and others. To ſeveral editions of this Eſſay is added a ſpecimen of blank verſe, being the Battle in Heaven, taken out of Milton's Paradiſe Loſt. II. Horace's Art of Poetry, tranſlated into Engliſh blank verſe. London 1680, in 4to. To which is prefixed, a copy of verſes by Mr. Waller. III. A Paraphraſe on the 148th Pſalm. IV. Silenus, being Virgil's ſixth Eclogue tranſlated. V. Ode on Solitude. VI. The 22d Ode of the firſt Book, and the 6th Ode of the third Book of Horace, tranſlated. VII. On Mr. Dryden's Religio Laici. VIII. The Dream. IX. The Grove; being a tranſlation of part of the 5th ſcene of the 2d act of Guarini's Paſtor Fida. X. The Ghoſt of the old Houſe of Commons to the new one, appointed to meet at Oxford. XI. On the death of a Lady's Dog. XII. A Prologue ſpoken to the Duke of York at Edinburg, and a Prologue and Epilogue to two of Mrs. Katharine Philips's plays. XIII. On the Day of Judgment. XIV. Roſs's Ghoſt. XV. He tranſlated into French, Dr. William Sherlock's Caſe of Reſiſtance on King James's acceſſion to the throne; at which time the Earl took a reſolution to paſs the remainder of his life at Rome [D], telling his friends, that it would be beſt to ſit next to the chimney when the chamber ſmoked. Amidſt theſe reflections he was ſeized by the gout; and being too impatient of pain, he permitted a bold French pretender to phyſic to apply a repelling medicine, in order to give him preſent relief, which drove the diſtemper into his bowels, and in a ſhort time put a period to his life (d), about January the 17th 1684 (e) at his houſe near St. James's Weſtminſter. The moment in which he expired, he cried out with a voice, that expreſſed the moſt intenſe fervour of devotion (f),

My God, my Father, and my Friend,
Do not forſake me at my end (g).

He was interred in Weſtminſter Abbey. He was ſucceeded in his honours by his uncle Cary Dillon, who was Colonel of a Regiment in Ireland in the war between King James II. and King William III. from which Kingdom returning to England he died at Cheſter in November 1689 (b).

(d) Fenton, ubi ſupra.

(e) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 234.

(f) Fenton, ubi ſupra.

(g) See his tranſlation of the Church's Hymn, Dies Iræ, Dies illæ.

(b) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(3) Ibid. p. 136. of Supreme Powers. Mr. Fenton obſerves (3), that in our author's writings "we view the image of a mind, "that was naturally ſerious and ſolid, richly fur-"niſhed and adorned with all the ornaments of art "or ſcience, and theſe ornaments unaffectedly diſ-"poſed in the moſt regular and elegant order. His "imagination might have probably been more fruit-"ful and ſprightly, if his judgment had been leſs "ſevere; but that ſeverity (delivered in a maſculine, "clear, ſuccinct ſtyle) contributed to make him ſo "eminent in the didactical manner, that no man "with juſtice can affirm he was ever equalled by "any of our own nation, without confeſſing at the "ſame time, that he is inferior to none. In ſome "other kinds of writing his genius ſeems to have "wanted fire to attain the point of perfection; but "who can attain it?" Mr. Pope likewiſe in his Eſſay on Criticiſm (4) ſpeaks of our Author in theſe terms:

——Roſcommon, not more learn'd than good,
With manners gen'rous as his noble blood;
To him the wit of Greece and Rome was known,
And ev'ry Author's merit but his own.

(4) Ver. 727 & ſeq.

[D] The religious commotions which enſued on King James's acceſſion to the throne, at which time the Earl took a reſolution to paſs the remainder of his life at Rome.] Theſe are the words of Mr. Fenton (5); but there is a miſtake in them, ſince according to that Writer himſelf, the Earl died in 1684, or according to Mr. Wood (6), January the 17th, 1684-5; by which it appears, that he did not ſurvive the reign of King Charles II. who died February the 6th, 1684-5.

T.

(5) Ubi ſupra, p. 135, 136.

(6) Ubi ſupra.

ROSE (WILLIAM), preacher to Henry III. and Biſhop of Senlis, the moſt furious of all the Leaguers in France. See the notes on the Catholicon (a): but add the following circumſtance, that having refuſed to lay aſide his pontifical veſtments, when the Parliament of Paris obliged him to make amende honorable (a kind of penance) the 5th of September 1598, he made it in his epiſcopal dreſs (b). Mr. de Launoi ought to be highly blamed for beſtowing ſo many elogiums on this Prelate (c), without interſperſing it with one ſingle cenſure. This is really ſcandalous.

(a) Notes on the Catholicon d'Eſpagne, p. 196 & ſeq. edit. of 1696. See alſo p. 91.

(b) Thuan. lib. 120. p. 827.

(c) Launoius, in Hiſt. Collegii Navarr. p. 1019 & ſeq.

ROSE (TOUSSAINT), Marquis of Coye, Secretary of the King's Cabinet, Preſident of the Chamber of Accompts, and one of the forty Members of the French Academy, had been Secretary to Cardinal Mazarin. He died the 6th of January 1701, in his fourſcore and ſixth year (a). His poſterity is ſtill ſubſiſting [A]. The ſeat in the Academy which became vacant by his death, and in which he had ſucceeded Mr. Conrart in 1675, was filled by Mr. de Saci, the 17th of March 1701. We find by the Menagiana, that he was of a good family of Provins; that he had been Secretary to Cardinal de Retz, and had writ ſome extremely beautiful letters in his name (b).

(a) Mercure Galant, for Jan. 1701. p. 104.

(b) Menagiana, p. 297, of the 1ſt Dutch edit.

[A] His poſterity is ſtill ſubſiſting.] Louis de Roſe, his ſon, Lord of Coye, Counſellor of the Parliament of Mentz, and Secretary of the King's Cabinet, died in 1688, and left, by Magdelen de Bailleul his wife (1), a ſon and daughter. The daughter married, the 28th of April, 1699, Anthony Portail, Attorney General in the Parliament of Paris (2).

(1) Daughter to Mr. de Bailleul, Preſident à Mortier. She afterwards married Marquis de Vatan.

(2) Extracted from the Mercure Galant, for Jan. 1701. p. 105.

ROSEN (a) (REINHOLD), a Gentleman of Livonia [A], ſerved under the Duke of Weimar, afterwards in the French armies, and had the reputation of being a brave warrior [B]. He married in Alſatia, and was ſettled to very great advantage there (b) He went and paid his compliments to the King, at the Siege of Dole in 1668, on which occaſion "he was mounted on a horſe aged thirty eight years, which he ſaid had "ſaved

(a) The Latin hiſtorians call him Roſa, and the French Roſe.

(b) Mercure Galant, for Feb. 1703. p. 332.

[A] A Gentleman of Livonia.] He was of a family of which there have been Knights of the Order of Sword-bearers (1); and we know that Mr. Roſen, Marſhal of France, had records brought from Livonia, which prove that the nobility of his houſe is of great antiquity. He has the honour to be related to the royal family of Sweden; and there was a Marſhal of his family (2).

[B] He had the reputation of being a brave warrior.] He muſt neceſſarily have been a valiant man, and ſkilled in war, ſince the Duke of Weimar gave him the command of the horſe (3), and appointed him, by his will, one of the Directors of the Army (4). It would be endleſs to particularize all the battles he was in, and wherein he gave proofs of his courage. I therefore had better refer my Readers to the relations of that time. He is often mentioned in them under the title of Colonel Roſe: but I muſt not omit that he was not always victorious, he being taken priſoner at Mariendal in 1645 (5), when Marſhal de Turenne's army was beat there. He would have met with the ſame ill fate at the defeat at Darlingen (6), had he not fled with the utmoſt ſpeed (7). Marſhal de Turenne was not ſatisfied with his conduct at the battle at Mariendal (8); and was leſs ſo, two years after, when

(1) Mercure Galant, for Feb. 1703. p. 331.

(2) Ibid. p. 335.

(3) Cum ſub Bernardi Saxonis auſpiciis magiſtrum equitum egiſſet. Franckenſteinius, in Indice Hiſt. Benjam. Prioli.

(4) Pufendorf, Rerum Suecic. lib. 11. p. 374.

(5) Franckenſ. in Indice Hiſt. Prioli.

(6) The 14th of Nov. 1643.

(7) Appendix Hiſt. Univerſ. Joh. Cluveri, p. m. 759.

(8) See Turenne's Life, by the pretended Mr. du Buiſſon, book 3. p. 195. Hague edit. 1688.

"saved his life at the battle of Rocroy (c)." He died some time after, and settled a pension on his horse, with a meadow, and gave him his liberty (d) [C]. Having no male issue, he resolved to promote one of his relations, who had prevailed with him to quit Livonia; accordingly he got him a wife, and left him all his possessions. This kinsman was created Marshal of France in January 1703. He has a great estate in Alsatia, which is settled upon him in fee (e). He has a son who is Major-General, and a daughter married to Marquis de Rottemberg (f).

(c) Mercure Galant, for Feb. 1703. p. 333.

(d) Ibid. p. 334.

(e) Ibid. p. 336.

(f) Ibid. p. 334, 335.

when he thought him the chief promoter of the rebellion meditated by the Swedes in his army, insomuch that he put him under a guard (9): but he afterwards received an order from Court, to set him at liberty (10).

Priolo observes, that a brother of our Rosen was killed at the battle of Rhetel, in December 1650 (11). Mention is made, in the Mercure François (12), of Colonel JOHN ROSE, cousin to Colonel Reinhold Rose. In page 899, volume 5, of the Theatre de l'Europe, mention is made of one VOLMAR ROSA, who was killed for having given a box o'the ear (13).

[C] He settled a pension on his horse, with a meadow, and gave him his liberty.] A man, who was desirous to lay hold of every opportunity of communicating his collections, would have a large field here. For though he even should not speak of all such animals, to whom testimonies have been given of affection and gratitude (14), but only of such as relate to horses, he might mention a vast number of instances. I know some, besides those which I took notice of in the remark [M] of the article CALIGULA, and in the remark [O] of the article of the Emperor HADRIAN; but I nevertheless will be pretty concise on that subject. The Reader may easily consult Philip Camerarius, who has given very good collections relating to this subject in Tom. 1. book 2. chap. 1. of his historical meditations. Some citations relating to this purpose are also seen in the Peintures Morales of Father le Moine. He did not forget Caligula; but has represented his folly in such affected terms, that it is impossible for me to resist the inclination I have to transcribe them here. An Emperor, says he (15), caused a palace of marble to be built for a horse. He had it furnished in a princely manner, and ordered him to have the retinue of a Monarch. Not contented with this, he nominated him Consul, gave him a seat in the Senate, and had his name registred in the Fasti or Roman Calendar, with Cato, Pompey, and such like illustrious personages. Had he survived him, he doubtless would have made a god of him, by a new kind of apotheosis; and forced the twelve Gods of the capitol to admit him into their number. Pliny (16) also gives us some instances of honours which have been paid to horses.

All military men have not been so grateful to their horses as our Rosen. A Neapolitan Gentleman having forsaken his horse, was sentenced to keep him. Father Pardies quotes Spondanus on this occasion, and says, that a great Prince (17) of former times, famous for his virtue, and his zeal in doing justice to every one, thought he pronounced a sentence worthy of his exalted rank, when he decreed in favour of an old horse, who, having been forsaken by his master in his old age, and to whom he had done very remarkable service in war, went, by I know not what instinct or accident, and rung a bell that was hung up at the palace gate, purposely that all who met with ill treatment, might ring it, in order to make their complaints, and sue for justice (18). Sabba Castiglione, a Gentleman of Milan, who, at his death, was Knight of Malta, and Commander of Faenza, in March 1554 (19), relates this story very much at large in chap. 122 of his Ricordi necessarii dal principio della vita civile, fino à fine di quella, &c. See Camerarius, in the chapter cited above.

I fancy that the Judges who pronounced sentence (20) in a law suit, against the cat of Madam du Puis, a celebrated player on the harp (21), would have acted otherwise, had such a cause for the horse of the Neapolitan Gentleman been brought before them. This Lady's Will made a great noise: and a suit was carried on, in order to have it set aside. Messieurs Maurice, Vautier, and de Ferriere, all famous Lawyers, displayed their genius and abilities, the former in defending it, and the two others in pleading against it. The pension which the deceased Lady settled on her cat, and the visits which she ordered should be paid her every week, were the circumstances most inveighed against (22).

(9) See Turenne's Life, p. 221, 222.

(10) Franckenst. in Indice Hist. Prioli.

(11) Priolus, de Rebus Gall. lib. 5. num. 36. p. m. 225.

(12) Tom. 23. p. 696, 699. ad ann. 1640.

(13) Franckenst. ibid.

(14) Concerning the honours paid to the Camel, see the rem. [DD] of the art. MAHOMET. See in the Mercure Galant, for July 1678, some honours paid to brutes.

(15) Father le Moine, in his Peintures Morales. See Suetonius, in Caligula, cap. 55.

(16) Plin. lib. 8. cap. 42. See also lib. 10. chap. 43. concerning the funeral of a raven.

(17) This was Charles duke of Calabria, son to Robert, King of Naples. See Spondanus's Ann. ad ann. 1328. n. 18. He quotes Summonte, lib. 3.

(18) Pardies, dedication to the treatise, de la Connoiss. des Betes.

(19) Ghilini, Tom. 2. p. 224.

(20) Mercure Galant, for July 1678. p. 136. Dutch edit.

(21) Ibid. p. 132.

(22) Ibid.

ROSEO or ROSEUS (MAMBRIN), an Italian Author, lived in the 16th Century. He published in 1549 the Institution of a Christian Prince, in which he neither imitated those who describe Government as it is commonly managed, nor those who represent it according to the most perfect speculation or theory. He steered a middle course between these two extremes [A], which was to shew what the rules of common policy allow. He continued the history of the world which John Tarcagnota had writ from Adam till the year 1513; he continued it, I say, till the year 1558. and afterwards till 1571 (a). This work is in Italian, and was continued by Don Bartholomew Denys de Fano, till the year 1582. Roseo was dead when the edition I make use of was printed, viz. that of Venice, appresso i Gunti 1585 in 4to. At the same time they reprinted Tarcagnota's work, the second edition of which is of the year 1562 (b). The reader may have seen elsewhere (c), that Roseo translated into Italian a treatise of the art military, which was supposed to be written by William du Bellai. He also wrote a history of the Kingdom of Naples. He shews prodigious partiality, in his continuation of Tarcagnota, every time he speaks of the Protestants; and it appears that he follows the methods of bad historians, who never examine the testimonies of each party, but only those of the

(a) This continuation was printed at Venice in 1573, 4to.

(b) I speak in this manner, because the dedication to Cosmo of Medicis, Duke of Florence, was dated at Naples, the 1st of Jan. 1562.

(c) Rem. [G] of the art. BELLAI (William de).

[A] He steered a middle course between these two extremes.] I am obliged to Naudæus for this observation. Niphus, says he (1), & Machiavellus Principes suos effinxére, quales ut plurimùm esse deprehenduntur: Erasmus, Osorius, Foxius, Natta, Omphalius Wimphelingus, ut se moraliter gerere deberent: Mambrinus Roseus, Frachetta, & Lælius Marettus Senensis, cujus liber publici juris nondum factus est, ut illis Politicæ communis legibus agere conceditur. Bellarminus denique, Ribadeneira, & Scribanius, ut se ad Christianæ Religionis Præcepta componere deberent. i. e. "Niphus and Machiavel have drawn their Princes, such as they "are commonly found; Erasmus, Osorius, Fox, "Natta, Omphalius, Wimphelingus, such as they "ought to behave, according to the dictates of mo"rality: Mambrinus Roseus, Frachetta, and Lælius "Marettus of Sienna, whose work is not yet made "publick, such as the common laws of policy will "allow them to be. Lastly, Bellarmin, Ribadeneira, "and Scribanius, as they ought to behave, in confor"mity to the principles of the Christian Religion." The reader sees, by this passage, the various methods which different Writers have employed for the instruction of Sovereigns. I shall observe, that as early the party they favour. Beſides, he is guilty of a vaſt number of errors in the proper names.

(1) Naudæus, Bibliogr. Polit. p. m. 47.

early as the year 1549, Mambrin Roſeo's work was publiſhed in French, and entitled, Le Parangon de vertu pour l'Inſtitution de tous Princes, Potentats, & Seigneurs Chreſtiens, contenant en Sommaire les Hiſtoires Hebraïques, Greques, Latines, & Modernes faiſans à propos. Pris de l'Italien de Membrin de la Roſe, à Paris per Eſtienne Groulleau 1549 in 8vo (2). A Latin verſion of this work was publiſhed at Straſburg in 1608. upon which Konig imagined very falſely, that Mambrin Roſeo wrote that book in 1608 (3). He is often guilty of ſuch miſtakes.

(2) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bibl. Franc. p. 839.

(3) Konig, Bibl. p. 701.

ROSES, a City of Catalonia. It was only an abbey, when the Emperor Charles V. built a city and a fortreſs there, at the diſtance of thirty five fathoms from the ſea, in the open country (a). This city has the Mediterranean to the South of it, the plain of Lampurdan and a pond to the Weſt; and the Pyrenees to the Eaſt and North. It is fortified with five baſtions, lined with free-ſtone. It continued faithful to the King when all Catalonia revolted to France in 1640. Du Pleſſis-Pralin beſieged it in 1645, and made himſelf maſter of it fifty ſeven days after the opening of the trenches, for which he was rewarded with a Marſhal's Staff. The Spaniards, having recovered the greateſt part of Catalonia during the civil wars of France, were yet not able to poſſeſs themſelves of Roſes. They blockaded it nine months, on which occaſion they reduced the garriſon to the greateſt extremities of famine; but at the approach of the ſuccours ſent from France they retired. This was in 1653. Roſes was reſtored to them by the peace of the Pyrenees in 1659. They loſt it in 1693 [A], and recovered it by the treaty of Ryſwick in 1697. The Bay of Roſes is above four leagues in circumference; beginning at the end of the Pyrenean mountains, at Trinity-Caſtle, and ending almoſt at the little town called Empurias. It has no harbours; being only a ſhallow road, to which neither ſhips nor gallies can come, for want of ſufficient water. However, between Trinity-Caſtle and the town is a ſmall hollow, where large ſhips may lye, for ſome time, when forced to it by neceſſity. A league and a half on the other ſide of the Caſtle, towards Rouſſillon and out of the Bay, is a town called Capdequiers (b), ſubject to the Governor of Roſes, and where there is a pretty good harbour (c).

(a) Baudrand, in Rhoda.

(b) It formerly was a ſtrong hold. See the cloſe of the rem. [G] of the art. REVEREND DE-BOUGY.

(c) Extracted from a Relation of the ſiege of Roſes, publiſhed in 1693.

[A] They loſt it in 1693.] Marſhal Duke de Noailles beſieged it about the end of May, and obliged Don Pedro Robi, the Governor, to capitulate the 9th of June. Trinity-Caſtle ſtanding at the entrace of the Bay of Roſes, and within canon ſhot of the place, was taken four days after.

ROSIER (a) (HUGH SUREAU DU), in Latin Hugo Suræus Roſarius (b), was a famous Proteſtant Miniſter of the Church of Orleans, under the reign of Charles IX. He was born at Roſoi in Tierache, in the Province of Picardy (c). He was impriſoned at Orleans in 1566 (α), upon his being thought Author of a book filled with ſeditious maxims [A]; but not being convicted of it, he was ſet at liberty. He and another Proteſtant Miniſter,

(a) Some call him Des Roriers.

(b) Thuan. calls him Sorellus Roſerius, book 34. p. 687. and Sorellus Roſarius, book 52. p. 1088.

(c) La Croix du Maine, p. 173.

(α) It was therefore very probably at Orleans, and for the particular uſe of the Proteſtant Church of that place, that Hugh Sureau cauſed to be printed in 1565, by Abel Clemence, the Pſalms of Marot and Beza, ſet in four parts by Goudimel, but in a more ſimple and eaſy muſic, with a particular diſtinction to each Pſalm, that part which is to be ſung in the ſervice. He alſo wrote a treatiſe of the marks of the true Church of GOD, in 8vo, Heidelberg 1574 *, and a Latin tranſlation of du Bellai's Memoirs, printed in 8vo. with a beautiful letter and on a fine paper, at Frankfort, by John Marſhal, anno 1575. I know not whether this is the ſame which Andrew Wechel had publiſhed the year before, without the Tranſlator's name †. By the way, it is related in the Memoires de l'Etat de France, under Charles IX. Tom. I. folio 277. that the reſtleſs temper of Hughes Sureau the Proteſtant Miniſter, occaſioned his being taken from Orleans, ... and firſt placed in ... and afterwards in the little Church of which he was Miniſter, when he was taken during the maſſacres of the year 1572. To conclude, I ſuppoſe that his ſirname du Roſier might be only a nickname, which might have been given him from his being born at Roſoi in Turache. REM. CRIT.]

* Thuan. Bibl. tom. 1. p. 175.

† Draud. Bibl. tom. 1. p. 1105.

[A] Upon his being thought Author of a book filled with ſeditious maxims.] Beza ſpeaks as follows concerning this Libel. "There was printed privately "at that time (1) in Lyons, without the Author's or "Printer's name, a book entitled, La defenſe civile "& militaire des innocens & de l'Egliſe de Chriſt, "compoſed no doubt by ſome wicked and ſeditious "ſpirit. This book falling into the hands of ſome "good people, the utmoſt endeavours were uſed to "diſcover the Author, but without effect, except "that it was ſtrongly ſuſpected that Charles du Mou-"lin, a famous Advocate of the Parliament of Paris, "who was then at Lyons, and had ſided with the "Proteſtants from the time of King Henry, was "Author of it; he having appeared both before and "after, a fantaſtical man. However, he denied it "with great oaths, whether right or wrong I ſay "not (2)." Lyons was then poſſeſſed by the Proteſtants. Soubiſe, who commanded in it, ordered the Miniſters to examine this work, and the judgment they paſſed upon it was as follows. "We Miniſters "of the word of God in the Proteſtant Church at "Lyons, ... after calling upon the name of God, "and peruſing a certain book publiſhed not long "ſince, entitled, La defenſe civile & militaire des "hommes & de l'Egliſe de Chriſt, certify and declare, "that it is full of falſe and evil doctrine, agreeing, "in ſome points, with that of the Anabaptiſts, ex-"citing men to ſedition, rebellion, and diſobedience "to Kings and Princes, contrary to the expreſs com-"mand and ordinance of God; and ſo much the "more, becauſe the Author of it wreſts ſeveral "teſtimonies and examples of ſcripture, which he "applies very ill to his purpoſe, contrary to their "true ſenſe and meaning, as we are ready to ſhew "and maintain by the word of God: for which "reaſon we deſire and requeſt, that the ſaid book "may be entirely deſtroyed, to prevent mankind "from being infected with ſuch ſeditious and peſti-"lent doctrine (3)." Soubiſe, in conſequence of this cenſure, commanded all thoſe who had this book to bring it in in four and twenty hours; and that all thoſe who ſhould ſell or diſperſe it ſhould be hanged, without being brought to a trial (4), and cauſed

(1) This is, in 1563.

(2) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſ. liv. 11. p. 244.

(3) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſ. liv. 11. p. 244.

(4) Ibid. p. 245.

caused it to be burnt by the hangman, in the four principal squares of the city, the 12th of June 1563 (5). Thus matters went with regard to this book, adds Beza (6); "and many years after du Rosier, a Minister "of Orleans, was accused of being the Author of "it. He was not then at Lyons but at Orleans, he "not knowing any more what was then doing in "Lyons, than what passed in the Indies. However, "he was prosecuted for it, and carried prisoner to "Paris with great noise, as though the Protestants "approved that doctrine. But God was afterwards "pleased to make the truth known, though du Ro-"sier had powerful enemies, particularly Birague, "who some years after, was the unworthy Governor "of Lyons." Thuanus relates, in few words, the prosecution carried on against this book; but observes that it was falsely ascribed to Charles du Moulin the Civilian (7). Deckherus has not given the title of this book exactly, Eodem (superiori seculo) says he (8), non expresso Authoris nomine vulgatus libellus de potestate Principis Lugduni combustus, &c. i. e. "Last century was published an anonymous libel, con-"cerning the power of the Prince, which was burnt in "Lyons, &c." One of the Censurers of Deckherus expressed, on occasion of these words, a doubt which he should not have entertained. He is in doubt whether this work differed from that which was printed at Paris in 1589, and entitled, Traité de la puissance des Rois contre le Roi de Navarre. Had he known that du Moulin died (9) long before any mention was made of the rights of the King of Navarre, he would have asserted in a very positive manner, that these two books were not the same; we here have a non liquet, which is no ways to his honour. An vero iste tractatus idem sit de quo Cl. Deckherus, pag. 338, loquitur tanquam Lugduni combusto, & falso adscripto Carolo Molinæo J. C. sed quem alii tribuant Hugoni Sorello Roserio, non mihi liquet (10). i. e. "I am not "certain whether this treatise be the same with that "mentioned by Deckherrus, page 338, as burnt in "Lyons, and falsely ascribed to Charles du Moulin a "Civilian; and ascribed by others to Hugh Sorellus "Roserius."

Here follow some errors of Davila. He says that in 1566, a Protestant Minister, born at Orleans, preached in a seditious manner, after having published a book to maintain, that the French ought no longer to obey the King, but might lawfully kill him, he being an idolatrous Prince. Nè erano meno ardite le penne de gli Ugonotti di quello, che si fossero l'armi, perche in questo medesimo tempo un Ministro, nativo di Orliens, andava seditiosamente predicando contro alla podestà del Rè, & havea anco stampato un libro, nel quale sosteneva, che il popolo Francese non era più in obligo d'obbedire al Rè, per esser egli diventato idolatra, & per questa ragione contendeva ancora, che si potesse lecitamente ammazzare, dalla quale empia è diabolica semente è poi successivamente derivata in altri tempi, & in altre persone, quella pestifera dottrina, che con horribile perversione d'ogni legge divina & humana ha insegnata à gli huomini ad insanguinarsi le mani sotto protesto di pietà, è di religione, nelle viscere de i Rè legitimi, constituiti sopra gli huomini per rappresentanti di Dio (11). i. e. "The pens of "the Huguenots were as bold as their swords; for "at the same time a Minister, a native of Orleans, "used to preach seditious sermons against the King's "power; he having likewise printed a book, where-"in he asserted, that the French nation were no "longer obliged to obey their King, because he was "turned idolater. Hence he likewise was prompted "to maintain, that it was lawful to kill him; from "which impious and diabolical seed afterwards "sprung up, in other persons, and at other times, "that pestiferous doctrine, which, to the utter per-"version of all laws divine and human, taught men, "under the pretence of piety and religion, to im-"brue their hands in the blood of lawful Monarchs, "appointed by Heaven to reign over men, as his "representatives." It is plain he there speaks of Rosier the Protestant Minister, who was imprisoned that year, upon pretence of his having writ a seditious libel. But I. This Minister was not born in Orleans. II. He did not preach against the King's power; for had his sermons been seditious, he might easily have been found guilty of rebellion. Birague his enemy, who threw him into prison as Author of a libel, would not have failed in his prosecution for want of proofs; for had he had no valid ones with respect to the book, he would have found such with regard to the sermons: consequently as our Protestant Minister was set at liberty, it plainly shews that his sermons were not such as Daval represents them. III. I can never believe, that the book burnt at Lyons inculcated that it was lawful to murder Kings; but am persuaded, that had it contained so execrable a doctrine, the Ministers, who censured him, would have censured it in much stronger terms. I confess that la Croix du Maine, a Protestant Author, tells us, that du Rosier wrote, among other French books, one wherein he endeavours to shew that it is lawful to kill a King and Queen, who refuse to embrace the Protestant Religion, and side with the Protestants (12): but I am persuaded, that though he says this, he yet had not seen the libel, which Soubise caused to be burnt. He only speaks, if I mistake not, on the testimony of the Authors cited by him. See, continues he, on this subject, the history of France, of our times, the last edition, enlarged by John Frere de Naval, and likewise Belleforest, in volume the second of his annals, at large, of France, folio 1689, 1653, &c. (13). Varillas, who certainly was not of a character to endeavour to extenuate the heinousness of this libel, represents it as a work, in which monarchical authority was opposed. It is plain to every one, that here is an infinite difference between this, and the doctrine which authorizes the murder of Kings. But it will be proper for me to quote the whole passage of this historian. "Soubise, before he left it (4), caused to be "there burnt, by the hands of the hangman, a sedi-"tious book printed there a little before. The Cal-"vinists ascribed it to Charles du Moulin, a famous "lawyer; and probably this was out of malice, be-"cause he was the only Frenchman who would not "leave the Lutheran Sect, to go over to theirs; for "this book does not seem to be writ in du Moulin's "style nor manner. It was properly a satyr against "all the Monarchs in Christendom, which he pre-"tended to destroy, by passages from scripture, cur-"tailed or perverted to a wrong sense. The Catho-"lic Authors say, that it was a Calvinist Minister; "that this was not the first time they had attempted "to defame the regal power in their writings; and "that three years before, viz. in the year one thou-"sand five hundred and sixty two, they had held a "synod in the city of Châlon on the Saone, wherein "they laid it down, that the equality of conditions "was the most certain privilege of the Gospel Li-"berty, which the blood of Christ had purchased for "true Christians. But this synod is not found in "the collection * of the first twenty six held by the "Protestants in France. There is nothing to be seen "about it except in the writings of their adversa-"ries; besides, it is not probable that their Ministers "should not at first have taken upon themselves, and "without the consent of Calvin, to lay down, as "the foundation of their religion, a paradox, which "Aristotle has refuted with so much solidity in his "ethicks, and which is so dangerous, that it tended "to overthrow, not only the Calvinistical principles "which it endeavoured to establish, but likewise "all civil societies of what kind soever (15)." The Protestants cannot complain of many particulars here; on the contrary, they ought to applaud the Author's equity, which justifies them pretty strongly. But his marginal note had led some very learned persons into a mistake; and their error, though excusable, is of great consequence. I say it is excusable, because a French reader must examine it very attentively, otherwise he will be apt to take this note of the historian, in the same sense as it was understood by the Authors of Acta Eruditorum. The first reflection, which presents itself to the reader of Varillas's note, is, that he saw, among the manuscripts of Lomenie, the synod which the Protestants have not inserted in the collection of their twenty six first synods. In this manner it was understood by the learned Authors of Acta Eruditorum. But this sense is very injurious to the Protestants; for were it true, that, in the collection of their synods, among the manuscripts of Lomenie, a synod held in 1560, which declares in favour of an equality of conditions, this would induce me to believe, that they had pronounced a decision there-

(5) Beze, Hist. Eccles. p. 236.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Quem vonnulli, sed falso, Carolo Molinæo J. C. alii Hugoni Sorello Roserio tribuebant. Thua. lib. 34. p. 687. ad. ann. 1563.

(8) Deckherus, de Scriptis Adespotis, p. 338.

(9) He died in 1566.

(10) Petrus Bælius, Epistola ad Almeloveenium de Scriptis Adespotis ad calcem Tractatus Deckheri, p. 371. edit. 1686.

(11) Davila, delle Guerre Civili di Francia, lib. 4. p. m. 160. ad ann. 1566.

(12) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franc. p. 173.

(13) He might have cited Miles Piguerre, Hist. de France, p. 457. edit. of 1582.

(14) i. e. Lyons.

* I have seen it among those of Lomenie.

(15) Varillas, Hist. de l'Heresie, book 26. p. 10, 11. ad ann. 1563. Dutch edit.

Miniſter, diſputed the ſame year againſt two Doctors of Divinity of Paris [B], in Duke de Nevers's palace, at the deſire of Duke Montpenſier, who flattered himſelf with the hopes, that this would prevail with his daughter, the Dutcheſs of Bouillon, to return to the Roman Catholick Religion, but he was deceived in his expectations. Du Roſier ſaved his life in the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's-Day, by abjuring his religion; and as he was employed immediately after to exhort the King of Navarre, the Prince of Condé, &c. to embrace the Romiſh Communion, and had all the ſucceſs on this occaſion, which the Court of France expected from it, he was thought extremely well qualified to be a converter (d). For this reaſon he was employed for this purpoſe in ſeveral parts of Paris; and the Court was ſo well ſatisfied with the progreſs he made, that he was ſent, with Maldonat the Jeſuit, to the country about Metz, where there was a plentiful harveſt. He harangued, he inveighed againſt the Proteſtant Religion, but was not perſuaded of the truth of what he ſaid [C]; for ſome Proteſtant Miniſter having an opportunity of ſpeaking to him in private, and repreſenting the ſad ſtep he had taken, he ſeemed quite (d) See in Thuanus, book 52. p. 1088, a long account of all this.

thereupon in 1560, which yet they afterwards thought proper to ſuppreſs, with all the records of that aſſembly. I muſt therefore inform every one, that the article Le, in the marginal note, refers, not to ſynod, but to collection. Varillas's meaning is, that he ſaw, among the collections of Lomenie, the collection of the firſt twenty ſix ſynods held by the Proteſtants, and that he did not therein find the ſynod of 1560, in which it is pretended that a deciſion was made concerning the equality of conditions. Ex Manuſcriptis Lomenianis decretum Synodi à Reformatis Catalauni (16) habitæ allegat, quo contra regiam poteſtatem ſtatuerint, æqualitatem conditionis humanæ inter potiſſima privilegia libertatis Evangelicæ eſſe, quam Chriſtus ſuo ſanguine veris Chriſtianis promeruerit (17).

(16) It ſhould be Cabiloni, for Catalaunum is Châlons on the Marne; now, according to Varillas, the Synod in queſtion was held at Châlons on the Saone, which city is called in Latin Cabilonum.

(17) Acta eruditorum, Lipſ. 1691. p. 31.

[b] He and another Proteſtant Miniſter diſputed .... againſt two Doctors of Divinity of Paris.] The Duke of Mompenſier was perſuaded, that the Ducheſs of Bouillon would quit the Calviniſtical principles, provided ſhe would but hear Doctor Vigor. He conſented however that du Spina, the Proteſtant Miniſter, ſhould be preſent, whilſt the Doctor juſt mentioned was ſpeaking. To content him, the Duke of Bouillon and Admiral Coligni ſettled conditions of a conference, which was to be held, at his houſe the 1ſt of July 1566. De Spina, accompanied by Barbaſte, Miniſter to the Queen of Navarre, went thither on the appointed day. They were aſked, whether they would pray, according to the manner of the Proteſtant Churches, before they began the conference; to which anſwer was made, that they were reſolved; and becauſe they perſiſted in the reſolution to begin with a prayer, pronounced aloud, in the place where the diſpute was to be carried on, the whole deſign was defeated; and they went away again, having rejected all the expedients, which were propoſed to them, to induce them not to make any prayer. Doctor Ruze told them, that if they were determined to pray, he would leave the room, and go and piſs whilſt they were at prayer. He deſired them to pray only mentally, or to go and pray in ſome neighbouring houſe: but all theſe propoſals were rejected, and ſo no conference was held (18). A report was ſpread, that they had fled from the diſpute. The Admiral aſſerted the contrary before the King and Queen; and ſaid they ſhould be ever ready to hold a conference with the Doctors, and to defend the faith they profeſſed by ſcripture. And now Duke de Nevers beſought their Majeſties that the conference might be revived, and the conditions of it were ſettled. Accordingly Doctor Vigor and de Sainctes on one hand, and de Spina and Sureau, the Proteſtant Miniſters, on the other hand, began the diſpute at his houſe the 9th of July 1566, and continued it ſeveral days. Some Hiſtorians affirm that Hugh Sorel (19) was taken out of priſon; Mezerai (20) and Varillas are among thoſe who ſay ſo, the latter of whom writes as follows: "Duke de Montpenſier imagined, that the beſt me-" thod to bring back the Ducheſs de Bouillon his " daughter, to the communion of the Catholick " church, would be, to have a publick conference " between two Doctors, and the ſame number of Pro-" teſtant Miniſters; and accordingly one was held in " the hotel de Nevers. The Doctors were, Simon Vi-" gor, afterwards Archbiſhop of Narbonne, and Claude " de Sainctes, afterwards Biſhop of Evreux. The " two Proteſtant Miniſters were to be John de l'Eſpine, " abovementioned, and Charles Barbaſte, who had " been a Carmelite: but Barbaſte not being able to " come to the conference, the Calviniſts deſired that " Hugh Sorrel des Roſier might be put in his room. " Des Roſiers was a Proteſtant Miniſter, who was im-" priſoned for writing a libel concerning the authority " of Magiſtrates; wherein he pretended that it was " lawful to extirpate, by any method whatſoever, a " King of a contrary religion. He deſerved to be " condemned to perpetual impriſonment for this " crime; but he obtained his pardon, by the ſolici-" tations of thoſe of his own perſuaſion, and the " credit of Duke de Montpenſier. It was judged " proper that the Ducheſs de Bouillon ſhould have no " cauſe to complain, upon pretence that ſhe could not " have the two Miniſters whom ſhe thought to be " the beſt diſputants *; and the diſpute was carried " on without heat, out of reſpect to the illuſtrious " perſons who aſſiſted at it. But notwithſtanding " this temper, both Catholicks and Calviniſts gave " out that they had been victorious. Nor did the " event clear up the truth of the matter, for if on " one hand, &c." (21). The account written by the Proteſtant Miniſters ſeems to inform us, that du Roſier was releaſed out of priſon, before any mention was made of his being a diſputant. For hearing that Vigor was ſick, and that Sainctes had left Paris, they were afraid leſt the conferences being interrupted, would continue too long ſo. They therefore deſired to return to their reſpective homes; and declared that they were come to Paris only by accident, viz. that de Spina was come thither in his way to Anjou; and the other, who was Paſtor of the church of Orleans, was but lately come out of priſon, whither he had been carried in the preceding month of June, on a falſe accuſation, forged by the enemies of the church of God againſt him, by which he was charged with being the Author of a pernicious and wicked book, written againſt the obedience we owe to Kings and Princes; and that therefore it would be very inconvenient for him to make a long ſtay in a town, to which he was come againſt his will (22). Claude de Sainctes printed the particulars of that diſpute (23).

* The Relation or Records of it are printed.

(21) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, book 27. p. 88.

(22) Records of the Conference, p. 323.

[C] He harangued, he inveighed againſt the Proteſtant religion; but was not perſuaded of the truth of what he ſaid.] I cannot do better than to make uſe of the words of the Hiſtorian of the Churches. Marſhal de Rets, Governor of the country about Metz, "tried " another expedient, he having brought to Mets an " unhappy Miniſter that had changed his religion, " named de Roſier, accompanied by one Maldonat, " a Spaniſh Doctor, and a Jeſuit, who was looked up-" on as the moſt learned and moſt ſubtle man in his " whole order. As for du Roſier, he had done all " that lay in his power, at Paris, to make others ab-" jure, inſomuch that he printed his abjuration, and " other books filled with falſities, and reſulting from " an evil conſcience; whereas before he paſſed for " a learned man, as he really was; he having even " been choſen to diſpute at Paris with Dr. Vigor " and Dr. des Sainctes. This man's abjuration proved " a great ſcandal to many; but he afterwards en-" deavoured to mend the matter as well as he could; " but, from that time, he never had a ſound judg-" ment

(23) In 1568, according to all the Bibliographers I have conſulted It is not likely this was the firſt edition. The Relation of the Proteſtant Miniſters was publiſhed two years before.

(18) Extracted from the preface to the Records or Relation of a Conference held at Paris, in July and Aug. 1566, between two doctors of the Sorbonne, and two Proteſtant Miniſters. I make uſe of the Antwerp edit. of 1566. 8vo.

(19) It ſhould be Sureau. Thuanus's Latin Sorellus has miſled the Hiſtorians on this occaſion.

(20) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, fol. Tom. 3. p. 145.

quite diſpoſed to make amends for it. He thereupon left Maldonat, and withdrew to Heidelberg, where he again turned Proteſtant. However, he could never recover the eſteem he before had among thoſe of his perſuaſion; and would have been, not only greatly deſpiſed, but miſerably poor, had not Andrew Wechel (e) made him corrector of his preſs in Frankfort. He died of the plague in that city, with his whole family [D]. When he was travelling to Metz, he was deſired to go to Sedan, to convert the ſame Dutcheſs of Bouillon, on whoſe account he had held a conference with two Romiſh Doctors; but he made no impreſſion on that Lady's mind (f). I ſhall ſpeak of his writings [E].

(e) See the rem. [D].

(f) See Thuan. lib. 52. p. 1088.

He is repreſented as a man of a wrangling temper, fond of particular opinions; and one who had ſowed the ſeeds of diſcord in the Church of Orleans [F], by the correſpondence

" ment, nor an upright conſcience; and, at laſt, " himſelf, with his wife and all his children, died of " the plague in Frankfort. To return to our Hiſto- " ry, theſe two being arrived in Mets, and moſt of " the Proteſtants being obliged, one Sunday, to re- " pair to the epiſcopal palace, du Rozier made a " long ſpeech to them, wherein he ſpoke concern- " ing the ſucceſſion of Biſhops, which, he ſaid, was " the characteriſtic of the true churches (24)." Beza adds (25), that being partly convicted by his own conſcience, and alſo adviſed by perſons of worth to take pity on himſelf, he beſought them to help him to get out of this quagmire, which was done; and this miſerable creature was carried to the church of Heidelberg, where he acknowledged his faults, of which he publiſhed a little treatiſe, contrary to what he had printed in Paris. What follows was publiſhed by a Proteſtant Miniſter, a great ſlanderer, who had abjured his religion. " They " (26) were greatly afraid, leſt du Roſier ſhould in- " ſiſt farther on that point (27). For this cauſe, ſome " perſons of Sedan went to him to a place called " Chemery, where they ſoon made him believe (he " being a fearful, inconſtant and credulous man) that " if he returned to Paris with Maldonat, he would " certainly, after they had triumphed over him, be " put to death; and that Duke de Bouillon had had " information of this, which was falſe. Moreover, " they told him that Maldonat had hinted towards " this, ſaying, that he had ſtill ſomething heretical " about him; inſomuch, that at Mets, their per- " ſuaſions wrought ſo far upon him, that he left the " Jeſuit without taking leave of him, and retired to " Germany; to enable him to do which, money was " given him; and afterwards a gathering (amount- " ing to upwards of 250 livres) was made, and ſent " to him (28)." I remember, ſays he elſewhere (29), " that this was the firſt crime they laid to du Roſier's " charge, when he ſeemed inclined to ſeparate from " them, and to return to the pale of the Chriſtian " and Catholick church. But when they ſaw that " this, and ſome other common faults, ſuch as the be- " ing a mumper, an everlaſting liar, &c. a man of no " reſolution, were not ſufficient to ruin his reputati- " on, ſome of them caſt a blemiſh on his wife's " chaſtity, giving out that ſhe had proſtituted herſelf " to ſome Canons of Orleans, a circumſtance that is " no ways probable, for reaſons which I had rather " leave to the conſideration of thoſe who have ſeen " and know her, than publiſh them."

(24) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. book 16. p. 475.

(25) Ibid.

(26) i. e. The Miniſters of Sedan.

(27) That which related to the vocation of the Miniſters.

(28) Matthew de Launoy, Declaration & Refutation des fauſſes ſuppoſitions, folio 139.

(29) Defenſe de Matthieu de Launoy contre les fauſſes Accuſations, folio 37.

[D] He died of the plague.] This Beza has related already, and we are alſo told the ſame by Philip Lonicerus. Ex improviſo ſiquidem anno ſuperiori, in ipſa Vindemia, peſte Rempublicam noſtram tunc infeſtante, ex hac vita, non ſine magno doctorum virorum, quibus ille notus erat, tuoque cum primis dolore, ex hac miſera vita, una cum uxore ſua, in cæleſtem illam avocatus eſt (30), i. e. " In the vintage-time laſt year, when our coun- " try was troubled with the plague, he, together with " his wife, was ſuddenly ſnatched from this wretch- " ed life, (to the great regret of learned men to " whom he was known, and yours in particular) and " tranſlated to a better in heaven." He writes in this manner to John Fichard, Syndic of the city of Frankf. in the dedication (to him) of a poſthumous piece of our Sureau, viz. of the Latin verſion of a work of John Corras (31). Had Lonicerus put a date to his dedication, we ſhould have known the exact year in which du Roſier died. The year of my edition (1588) is of no uſe to me. It is very certain that our Proteſtant Miniſter did not die the year before; he being dead when Beza publiſhed his Hiſtory of the Churches in 1580. Here follows another paſſage of Lonicerus, in which du Roſier is greatly applauded. Quæ ſit humanarum rerum fragilitas, Fichardе clariſſime, ſuperiore anno præmatura ſua morte, etiam noſter ille Hugo Suræus, non ſine doctiſſimorum virorum ſuſpiriis, teſtatus eſt. Qui cum laudatiſſimæ Andreæ Wecheli, viri optimi & humaniſſimi, Typographiæ ſtrenuam navaret operam, talem ſuæ induſtriæ, quam exacta, non ſolum Latinæ & Græcæ, verum etiam Hebraicæ atque Chaldaicæ linguæ notitia ornabat, laudem conſequutus eſt, ut omnibus bonis & doctis viris eſſet gratiſſimus (32), i. e. " How frail and uncertain all human things are, " moſt illuſtrious Fichard, was evident laſt year, by " the too early death of our Hugh Sureau, greatly " lamented by the learned: who, whilſt he was em- " ployed in the noble printing-houſe of Andrew " Wechel, a perſon of great humanity and good- " neſs, was ſo extremely diligent, and ſo well ſkilled " not only in the Greek and Latin, but likewiſe in " the Hebrew and Chaldee tongues, that he gained " the eſteem of all perſons of worth and learning."

(30) Phil. Lonicerus, Epiſt. Dedicat.

(31) The decree of the Parliament of Toulouſe, againſt the pretended Martin Guerre; which decree Corras, who reported the cauſe, wrote a large commentary upon.

(32) This is the beginning of the dedication.

I find by Geſner's Bibliotheque (33), that this Latin verſion of Corras's work was printed at Frankfort in 1579, apud Andream Wechelum. If this was the firſt edition, du Roſier muſt have died in autumn 1578. The Author of the Notes on the Confeſſion of Sanci (34), fixes his death to the year 1575 (β).

(33) p. m. 425.

(34) p. 470, 471, edit. of 1699.

§ (β) We find in Memoires de l'etat de France ſous Charles IX. tom. 2. f. 74, verſo of the 2d edition, under the year 1572, that Hugh Sureau, who eſcaped from the city of Metz, the 19th of December, died about three years after, at Frankfort, where he had reſumed his employment of Corrector of the preſs. REM. CRIT.]

[E] I ſhall ſpeak of his writings.] He compoſed ſeveral in French, according to La Croix du Maine (35), who mentions only two, that concerning the killing of Kings, and a treatiſe concerning his confeſſion of faith, with an abjuration of the Huguenot principles, &c. printed at Paris in 1573. The Reader has ſeen above, that he wrote one concerning his return to the Proteſtant religion. He had publiſhed ſome controverſial works at Orleans, before the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's day, as appears from the anſwers of Gentianus Hervetus, mentioned in La Croix du Maine (36). I obſerved elſewhere (37), that he tranſlated du Bellai's Memoirs into Latin. Had Konig ſaid, that Hugo Suræus gave a Latin verſion of an Arret of the Parliament of Toulouſe, he would not have expoſed himſelf to cenſure; but he uſed the following expreſſion, edidit arreſtum Parlamenti Tholoſani in caſu admirabili matrimoniali ann. 1588 (38); but it is faulty in two reſpects; 1ſt, It does not diſtinguiſh, whether Sureau is the Tranſlator or Author, or barely the Publiſher of this decree. 2d, Sureau could not publiſh ſuch a piece in 1588, he dying before. There are a great number of ſuch errors in our Bibliographers.

(35) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franc. p. 173.

(36) Reſponſe à Hugues Sureau dit des Roſiers, Maiſtre d'Eſcole à Orleans. L'Anti-Hugues, ou Reſponſe à Hugues Surreau dit des Roziers, imprimé par Cheſneau, l'an. 1566. ibid. Here is an Anti not mentioned by Baillet.

[F]. He . . . . had ſowed the ſeeds of diſcord in the church of Orleans.] The following character is given of this Miniſter, in the Memoirs de ſtatu Religionis & Reipublicæ in Regno Galliæ, a work aſcribed to John de Serres. Vir non ineruditus (Rozarius) ſed fœdiſſimo lapſu oſtendens quid ſit infirmitas humana, & quam periculoſum etiam ſit, pacato tempore, dum nullo hoſte urgemur, indulgere inſanientis noſtræ rationis commentis, ut certam exploratamque veritatem ſempiternis principiorum firmamentis reſpondence he held with ſome Fanaticks; ſo that there was reaſon to fear that the Church of France would have been ſadly divided, had the peace laſted; and had not the maſſacre put a ſtop to ſchiſm of every kind.

(37) In the article BELLAI (William du) rem. [D].

(38) Konig, Bibl. p. 786.

firmamentis cælo & terra firmiorem, in dubium pro arbitratu noſtro revocemus: quo curioſæ licentiæ morbo Rozarius laborabat, corrupto quodam more & ambitioſiore de Eccleſiæ ſucceſſione, diſciplina, & de aliis etiam Religionis capitibus ſuperciliose diſputans, ſeque ſuis collegis hac in re excellentiorem importuno quodam ſtudio exiſtimans. Non obſcurarum enim turbarum ſemina in Eccleſia Aureliana inſeminarat, dum ſeſe cum novorum commentorum architectis, phanaticis ingeniis familiarius conjungeret: unde, niſi periculoſæ tranquillitatis incommoda, novo hoc remedii genere Deus præcidiſſet, magnæ & periculoſæ turbæ in Eccleſiis Gallicis erant haud dubie exundaturæ (39), i. e. "Rozarius, who was a man of ſome learning, ſhewed, by his moſt ſhameful fall, what human frailty is; and how dangerous it is, in times of peace, when we are not attacked by any enemy, to give a looſe to the fictions of our bewildered reaſon; and to call in queſtion, at pleaſure, truth, which is eſtabliſhed on principles more ſolid than the foundations of heaven and earth. Rozarius was infected with this too licentious curioſity; he diſputing haughtily, in a corrupt and ambitious manner, concerning the ſucceſſion and diſcipline of the church, and other articles of religion; and imagining himſelf, on account of his unſeaſonable diligence on this occaſion, ſuperior to the reſt of his Collegues. Rozarius ſowed the ſeeds of troubles and diviſions in the church of Orleans; he contracting a familiarity with men of a fanatical turn, who projected innovations; whence, mighty and moſt dangerous commotions would doubtleſs have enſued in the churches of France, had not heaven prevented, by this new kind of remedy, the ill conſequences that muſt have flowed from a dangerous tranquillity." Another Author of that age writes as follows: "One du Roſier, a Proteſtant Miniſter, a man of ready wit, but reſtleſs and irreſolute, having been taken priſoner within a day's journey from Paris, as he was running away, began to waver, and ſoon after, changed his religion (40)."

(39) De Statu Religionis & Reipubl. part. 4. ad ann. 1572. folio m. 4.

(40) Hiſt. des choſes memorables avenues en France, ad ann. 1572, p. m. 444.

ROTAN (JOHN BAPTIST), a Proteſtant Miniſter of Rochelle, was highly eſteemed for his genius and erudition; but was ſuſpected to have betrayed his party [A], by favouring clandeſtinely the deſire which Henry IV. had to go to maſs. It is related that, having promiſed to let himſelf be overcome, in diſputing with du Perron, before that Prince in 1593; either remorſe of conſcience or vanity obliged Rotan to feign himſelf ill, to prevent his diſputing [B]. We are told that he continued to prevaricate

[A] He was ſuſpected to have betrayed his party.] d'Aubigné relates (1), that Rottan the Proteſtant Miniſter, a Piemonteze (2), a deep Divine, and a ſubtle Philoſopher, was deſirous to be a Courtier; and imagined that the third party, which was formed ſome time after the death of Henry III. would open a breach by which he might come into buſineſs. He joined with Morlas, who had the ſame deſign; after which both of them concerted, with du Perron, the methods how to bring over the King to the Romiſh religion. They met with favourable treatment from the Director of the Finances; a circumſtance that brought over other people to their faction. Rotan and Morlas diſputed on ſeveral points, againſt du Perron, in his Majeſty's preſence; and prevaricating, yielded to that prodigy in learning; inſomuch, that from the time of the ſiege of Roan, he had inſinuated himſelf into the King's favour, by his eaſy and inchanting eloquence. . . Whilſt this was doing, each of them giving an opportunity to his friend, they propoſed a change of religion. I am to obſerve, that Rotan began to be pleaſed with a Court-life, when he ſolicited there for ſome monies which he had lent, or rather cauſed other perſons to lend in Geneva, for the levies raiſed by Sanſi (3). This ſhews that he did not confine himſelf to the duties of his function, he concerning himſelf with politicks; whence we are no longer to wonder, that the inſtant he had breathed the air of courts, that he bent his thoughts to the making of his fortune, by preferring his temporal intereſt to religion. He was ſent to Mante, with ſeveral others, to repreſent to the King the grievances of the Proteſtants; but he had got himſelf privately choſen to diſpute againſt du Perron (4). Now he had promiſed to prevaricate very artfully; but the time being come for him to do it, it ſo happened that the fear of his reputation, or fear, ſtruck him to ſuch a degree, that he choſe rather to feign himſelf ſick; upon which Beraud, the Proteſtant Miniſter of Montauban, was put in his room. Both parties diſputed eagerly, on the ſufficiency or inſufficiency of the ſcriptures, and the words of the epiſtle to Timothy. But the conference was interrupted by the prohibition of the Clergy.

(1) D'Aubigné, Hiſt. Univerſ. Tom. 3. book 3. chap. 24. p. m. 405. ad ann. 1593.

(2) Others ſay that he was born among the Griſons. See the paſſage hereunder of CAYET, citation 6.

(3) D'Aubigné, Hiſt. Univerſ. Tom. 3. book 3. chap. 24. p. 405.

(4) Ibid. book 4. chap. 11. p. 505.

[B] Rotan feigned himſelf ill, to prevent his diſputing.] The reader has ſeen that d'Aubigné ſays ſo: and I'll now add, to his relation, that of the Hiſtorian of the Edict of Nants. We find, by him, that Rotan's conduct was approved in a national Synod. "Rotan, a famous Proteſtant Miniſter, was ſuſpected to favour thoſe artifices, whether or no he had been really allured by the hopes of a reward, or only pretended to approve them, in order to get himſelf deputed; that commiſſion then doing great honour to thoſe on whom it was beſtowed. A conference was accordingly opened, in which du Perron, by the colluſion of his antagoniſt, appeared as certain of being victorious. The diſpute turned upon the ſufficiency of the ſcriptures; and the interpretation of verſe 16. chap. iii. of St. Paul's ſecond epiſtle to Timothy. But Rotan, not daring, either through honour or conſcience, to act ſo baſe a part as it is ſaid he had promiſed to do, feigned an indiſpoſition, and by that means brought himſelf off. Beraud, a Proteſtant Miniſter of Montauban, took his place; but the conference was not carried on very far, when it was found, that the cheat contrived with Rotan would prove ineffectual. The Clergy found means to diſcontinue it, without ſeeming to break it; and, on the other hand, the Proteſtant Miniſters offered to renew it, every time that an opportunity ſhould preſent itſelf for that purpoſe. But becauſe the Clergy, notwithſtanding thoſe offers, boaſted they had forced the Proteſtant Miniſters to give out; Beraud and Rotan cauſed the national Synod, held at Montauban the following year, to approve all they had done in the conference. Rotan was ſheltered under Beraud's protection; which approbation put an end to the ſuſpicion that was entertained of the former's colluding with his antagoniſts (5)." We don't find clearly, neither by this relation, nor by that of d'Aubigné, whether Rotan feigned indiſpoſition after ſome conferences, or before any were held. For this reaſon, in order to give the Reader a more diſtinct idea of this particular, I ſhall tranſcribe what I find in another Hiſtorian. "Among theſe Deputies, ſays he (6), were ſeveral Proteſtant Miniſters; and, among others, one Rotan, born among the Griſons, who boaſted, when in Rochelle, that he would vanquiſh any Catholick Doctor in diſputation, and was himſelf perſuaded he could do it. That even to ſhew this was his opinion, he had ſent for a great number of books from Rochelle to Mantes; on which occaſion he was very much aſſiſted by Mr. du Pleſſis, Governor of Saumur. . . . On the day appointed, the ſaid Sieur du Perron, and Rotan the Miniſter, after

(5) Hiſt. de l'Edit de Nantes, Tom. 1. book 3. p. 112. ad ann. 1593.

(6) Peter Victor Cayet, Chronologie Novenaire, part. 2. fol. 269 verſo.

varicate during the remainder of his life; and that he and de Serres intended to ſet about a fraudulent deſign in a national Synod [C], but both of them died before the holding of it. Rotan had taught Divinity in Rochelle (a). He publiſhed a controverſial work concerning the Euchariſt [D], and another (b) to refute the motives of Cayet's converſion. There is reaſon to believe, that he had been Miniſter of the Church of Geneva [E]. He had been admitted to his Doctor's degree (in Divinity) at Heidelberg in 1573. Zanchius, who performed the ceremony on that occaſion, declares, that this Candidate had been baniſhed fifteen years, on account of his religion; and that he ſubmitted

(a) Cum Rupellam rediiſſet (Andreas Rivetus) publice profitentem audivit Joannem Baptiſtam Rotanum Italum, doctiſſ. & eloquentiſſimum Doctorem, qui ſcholam Theologicam aperuerat. Meurſius, Athen. Batav. p. 316.

(b) Printed at Rochelle, in 1596. It contains 215 pages in 8vo.

" ter certain preambles of challenging and reſpect " mixed together, each party proteſting that they " were moved only by a zeal for truth, they began " to talk on the ſufficiency of the ſcriptures (7)." This Hiſtorian having given the ſubſtance of the objections and anſwers, in a very partial manner againſt the Proteſtants, concludes as follows: Rotan was then in a little confuſion, and began to praiſe the ſaid du Perron, and then the aſſembly broke up for that day. Rotan never came to the conference after this; but in his room came Berault, Miniſter of Montauban, who, during the ſix days following, was carried by the ſaid Sieur du Perron, per omnes locos dialecticæ, about the word σοφίσαι, to make wiſe. Hiſtory, Poetry, Mathematicks, Philoſophy, Phyſicks, Morality, Metaphyſicks, Scholias and Commentaries, were brought in, which Berault diſputed upon right or wrong; but all his endeavours were vain to prove, that this word ſignified or included ſufficiency. And indeed, after having applauded the ſaid Sieur du Perron, he hinted that he was not come prepared to diſpute. Thus ended this conference; and the Proteſtant Miniſters returned to their reſpective provinces (8).

(7) Cayet, ibid. fol. 270 verſo.

(8) Idem, ibid. folio. 271 verſo.

[C] He and de Serres intended to ſet about a fraudulent deſign.] I have read this no where but in d'Aubigné, who informs us of the arts employed by the court to corrupt the Proteſtant Miniſters; and afterwards ſays, The effect of it appeared particularly in the Miniſters Rotan, Serres, Cahiers, Morlas and de Vaux. The whole ſecret of theſe artifices, and particularly of thoſe of Mante, was diſcovered by the latter, who owned his prevarications to ſeveral eminent perſons, with dreadful cries (9). D'Aubigné was own of thoſe perſons. After, ſays he (10), he had depoſited his confeſſion in my boſom, with ſighs, he put into my hands three indentures or bonds, one of two thouſand five hundred crowns, and the other two of a little leſs value, which I reſtored to his heirs. In the confeſſion Catholique de Sancy, he feigns that Cahier relates all theſe particulars; and introduces him affirming, what d'Aubigné had not dared to affirm (11), with regard to the circumſtances of this de Vaux's death. " Being " in this perplexity," (ſays Sancy) (12), " I ſpied Mr. " Cahier walking in the court. I flew to aſk him " what was become of de Vaux the Miniſter. Sir, " ſays he, this wretch, after the ſpecious promiſes he " had made to the Biſhop of Evreux, and received " money from him, in order to have an opportunity " of performing them, was ſeized with a pannick; " he crying and bawling that God's cauſe had " been betrayed by himſelf and five of his companions, whom he pointed at, but without naming " them. He added, that God would pardon him, " in caſe he went to his houſe, and there reſigned " up his ſoul into the hands of God, as ſoon as he " ſhould be got to Millaud. In the mean time he offered to write letters to the Biſhop of Evreux, " which he would ſend by ſome truſty perſon, " whereby the Biſhop of Evreux would diſcover the " prevarication of the diſpute of Mantes, and the " reſt of the prevarications of Rohan (13) and de Serres, whom, you are ſenſible, had promiſed their " perfidious aſſiſtance very early. But the Huguenots " were ſo ſilly as to refuſe his offer, ſaying, that " Chriſt's Kingdom ought not to be eſtabliſhed by artifice (14). I aſked, how will it be poſſible for " Rohan (15) and Serres, and the reſt, to juſtify themſelves? to which Cahier anſwered, theſe need no " cover or juſtification, they being covered with earth, " and I will tell you how they came to die. The " inſtant they heard of de Vaux's confeſſion, they encouraged one another by letters; got themſelves " elected for the national Synod of Montpellier, firm" ly determined to hazard all; and endeavoured, " before they retreated, to get ſomething by the " confederates. But it unhappily fell out, that they " both died at the opening of the Synod." The Author of the Notes on the Confeſſion of Sancy obſerves (16), that this is the national Synod which was held at Montpellier in May 1598; and againſt which Reboul compoſed, in 1600, the ſatyr entitled, Actes du Synode univerſel de la ſainte Reformation, i. e. " Acts or Records of the general Synod of the Re" formation."

(9) D'Aubigné, Tom. 3. liv. 5. chap. 1. p. 625.

(10) Ibid. p. 626.

(11) See the original, I do not relate it.

(12) Confeſſion Catholique de Sancy, lib. 2. laſt chap. p. 547. edit. 1699.

(13) It ſhould be Rotan.

(14) Confeſſion Catholique de Sancy, liv. 2. laſt chap. p. 548.

(15) Read Rotan.

(16) Notes ſur la Confeſſion de Sancy, p. 560.

[D] He publiſhed a controverſial work concerning the Euchariſt.] It was printed in Rochelle, and entitled, Traité orthodoxe de l'Euchariſtie (α). Doctor Julius Cæſar Bulenger refuted it in a book printed at Paris for Frederick Morel in 1598, in 8vo. He refers to it in the Preface to his Catholick anſwer to Du Pleſſis Mornai's book on the Euchariſt.

§ (α) The treatiſe, to which, be it ſaid by the way, Rotan did not put his name, was not printed later than 1596, ſince there was printed the ſame year, by Giles Robinot, an anſwer written by Cayet under the following title: Levray Orthodoxe de la foi Catholique du Sainct Sacrement de l'Autel, pour reſponſe au traité pretendu orthodoxe anonyme. REM. CRIT.]

[E] There is reaſon to believe, that he had been Miniſter of the Church of Geneva (β).] It appears by Melchior Adamus, that he was one of the three Proteſtant Miniſters (17) who went from Geneva to Berne in 1588, to be preſent at a ſynod aſſembled on occaſion of the diſputes which Samuel Huberus and Claude Auberi had excited (18). I have ſpoke elſewhere (19) of this Samuel Huberus; and will now obſerve that this Claude Auberi was Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Lauſanne; and that going out of his ſphere, and taking upon him to teach Divinity, he had taught both by word of mouth and writing, that man's righteouſneſs, before the tribunal of God, is an inherent quality. The ſynod condemned this opinion, and obliged Auberi and his adherents to acknowledge, that they embraced the doctrine contained in the confeſſion of faith of the Churches of Switzerland and France, viz. that we are juſtified before the throne of God by faith as by an inſtrument, with which we take hold of Chriſt our righteouſneſs. Claudius Alberius Triunturianus cum ſuis, receptæ doctrinæ & in confeſſione tam Gallicana quam Helvetica comprehenſæ: de noſtra ad tribunal Dei juſtificatione per fidem tamquam inſtrumentum, quo Chriſtus, juſtitia noſtra apprehendatur, profeſſus ſit penitus aſſentiri (20). I ſhall obſerve by the way, that he ſubmitted only verbally to the deciſions of this ſynod. I have a book publiſhed by one Anthony Leſcaille in 1591; and I therein find that Doctor Gryneus ſpoke in this manner in an aſſembly held at Baſil in December 1590, with regard to the diſputes between this Anthony Leſcaille, with Meſſieurs Conſtant and Couët, Miniſters of the French Church. " That there was " one Aubery, who had formerly writ a book, " which was ſince condemned at Berne, who had " ſubſcribed to ſome poſitions, which nevertheleſs " he afterwards had departed from. That paſſing " by Baſil, and returning to it as he came from " Frankfort, he had ſcatterred the ſeeds of his er" rors in ſeveral houſes at Baſil, and to ſeveral per" ſons; but that no one dared to maintain his errors " but Leſcaille, to whom the ſaid Aubery had left " a compoſition of his own writing. He therefore, " at his going away, ſhall give notice thereof to the " Magiſtrates of Berne, in order that the ſaid Au" bery may be puniſhed (21)." This Leſcaille was an illiterate Lay-man, who pretended to dogmatize; and put into the hands of his paſtors a piece upon good

(17) The two others were Beza and La Faye.

(18) Melch. Adam. in Vita Stuckii, p. 771. Vitarum Theol. German. Note, he puts this under the year 1578; but in Beza's Life, p. 229, where he relates the ſame thing, he puts 1588. See, on this ſubject, the text of the art. BEZA.

(19) Rem. [E] of the art. HUNNIUS.

(20) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. Germ. p. 771.

(21) La Doctrine ancienne du premier, deuxieme, troiſieme & dernier Jugement, ... par ALPDDGGH, p. 50, 51.

mitted with great chearfulneſs to the loſs he had ſuſtained of a conſiderable eſtate (c). Father Maimbourg may juſtly be criticiſed [F].

(c) Exilium quod propter Domini Jeſu Chriſti cauſſam, annos jam totos quindecim, cum non parvis ſuorum bonorum, eorumque non tenuium jactura conjunctum, æquiſſimo ſemper animo tulit, imo magnæ gloriæ loco habuit. Zanchius, Epiſt. lib. 2. p. 603.

(22) La Doctrine ancienne du premier, deuxieme, troiſieme & dernier Jugement, ... par ALPDDGGH. p. 27.

good works (22). Beza ſpoke to him as follows, in Auguſt 1591. "Take notice of what I ſay; you "did not write that piece, but Aubery, though he "denied it at Berne, againſt his conſcience. Leſcaille "ſaid, it is my compoſition, and Mr. Aubery never "ſaw it ſuch as it is. I do not deny but that I "learned of him, and of others, ſome things which "are in that piece. Beza ſaid, it is a bad piece, "to which Leſcaille anſwered, I did not give it as "though the whole was good; and when any per-"ſon ſhall ſhew me, by the ſcriptures, that there is "any thing bad in it, I will believe him: Beza "continued to ſay, Aubery has writ a bad book, "and you applaud it; to which Leſcaille replied, "what I underſtand in Mr. Aubery's book I think "extremely good; but as to what I do not under-"ſtand therein, I will neither praiſe nor condemn "it (23)."

(23) p. 92, 93.

§ (B) In the Citadin of Geneva, page 42, mention is made of the name of John Baptiſt Rotan, an Italian, as written in gold letters, among thoſe of the moſt famous Proteſtant Divines, in the regiſter of the Univerſity of Geneva. REM. CRIT.]

[F] Father Maimbourg may be juſtly criticiſed.] His words are as follow. "What have they not ſaid "to diſhonour the memory of Sponde, Lieutenant "General in Rochelle, of Salette, Counſellor to the "King of Navarre, of Morlas Counſellor of State, "and Superintendant of the Store-houſes of France, "of du Fay, Clairville, Rohan, and an hundred "more of their moſt famous Miniſters, who, after "having behaved very worthily among them, and "been the chief perſons in their conſiſtory, were on "a ſudden ſtrongly metamorphoſed into wicked vil-"lains and the worſt of wretches, for their having "abjured the Calviniſtical principles (24)?" He ſup-poſes in this paſſage, 1. That du Fay was a Proteſ-tant Miniſter. 2. That there was a Proteſtant Mi-niſter named Rohan (25). 3. That theſe two pre-tended Miniſters abjured the Proteſtant Religion. Now all this is falſe. They indeed were looked up-on as falſe brethren; but it does not appear that ei-ther Rohan or du Fay died really and open Papiſts. See the notes on the Confeſſion of Sancy, page 357 and 358 of the edition of 1699.

(24) Maimb. preface to the Hiſtory of the League.

(25) He was miſled by an er-ror of the preſs, which crept into the Catholick Confeſſion of Sancy.

ROTTERDAM, is one of the moſt conſiderable cities in Holland, and ſituated ſo advantageouſly on the Meuſe, as is of great advantage to the trade of it. There is no doubt but it was ſo called from its being built at the mouth of the Rotte (a). The time when it was begun to be built is not known; but we know that it was made a city about the year 1270, it being then ſurrounded with ramparts, and endowed with privileges (b). Nothing has made it more conſpicuous than its giving birth to the great Eraſmus [A], and it was not inſenſible to this glory, the inhabitants having taken care to honour

(a) It is the name of a river.

(b) Boxhornius, Theatr. Holland. p. m. 281.

[A] Nothing has made it more conſpicuous than its giving birth to the great Eraſmus.] Had Homer been as much eſteemed during his life time, as he was after his death, ſeveral cities would have aſpired to no purpoſe to the glory of having given birth to him; for that, which would really have had this advantage, had given indiſputable proofs of it, before a ſeries of years could have given other cities an occaſion of contending for it. This is the reaſon why there is no diſpute with regard to the place of Eraſmus's birth, the great reputation he enjoyed, during his life time, having prevented ſuch conteſts. Rotterdam was early ſenſible of this glory; and ſecured ſo well, whilſt the memory of things was recent, its claim to the poſſeſſion and ſplendor which accrued to it by being the birth-place of ſo great a man, that it cannot be chicaned upon any account. His mother was forced to fly to Rotterdam, to conceal her delivery, ſhe being poor. With regard to the place where he was begot, we muſt leave it entirely to the city of Tergou, which is not a little proud of that advantage. What would it be if this conception was not defiled with a double original ſin, or rather by an actual ſin, beſides the original? A Burgomaſter (1) of this town, aſſerted that Eraſmus was even born in it; and that Rotter-dam could boaſt of nothing but the education of him. But it is to no purpoſe for him to aſſert and repeat it; and though the records of the Convent of Stein agree in this fiction, yet the whole world is perſuaded, that Eraſmus was not born in Tergou, but in Rotterdam. What follows is confeſſed by the par-ties concerned. In a letter of the Burgomaſters and Counſellors of Tergou, inſerted in the deſcription of Flanders, tranſlated from the Italian of Lewis Guic-ciardin, are the following words (2): Oriundus etiam hac urbe magnus ille Deſiderius Eraſmus, Goudæ enim conceptus & utero geſtatus ROTERODAMI (quo cum ad pariendum vicina eſſet mater ſe certa de cauſa contulerat) IN LUCEM EDITUS EST. i. e. "The famous Deſi-"derius Eraſmus, was originally of this town. For "being begot in Tergou, and his mother continuing "there during her pregnancy, ſhe went to Rotterdam "and was DELIVERED OF HIM, ſhe having re-"tired thither for certain reaſons, a little before her "delivery." There is ſhewn, in the library of Tergou, a head of Eraſmus, which may be conſider-ed as a publick monument of the renunciations of that town with regard to the claim to his birth; the inſcription which is round that head declares that he was begot in Tergou, and born in Rotterdam. Not long ſince Mr. Almeloveen revived the diſpute be-tween thoſe two cities by a curious incident (3): he pretends that Eraſmus is rather a Burgomaſter of Ter-gou, than a Burgomaſter of Rotterdam, becauſe that, according to the laws, any place, where a child is accidentally born, is not conſidered as the place of his birth. If a woman, when upon a journey, hap-pens to be delivered in a town, in caſe ſhe did not intend to make any ſtay there, and made another place her ſettled abode; the child ſhe is delivered of is not conſidered as a citizen of that town; but the ſpot where her father and mother reſide is looked upon as its native place. At this rate Eraſmus ſhould be called Goudanus rather than Roterodamus, his fa-ther and mother living in Tergou; and his mother's not being delivered of him at Tergou, but at Rot-terdam, was merely an accident. She withdrew to conceal her guilt; ſhe concealed herſelf in a neigh-bouring town, only for ſome days, until ſuch time as ſhe was delivered of the burthen which, to her great ſhame, ſhe carried in her womb (4).

I will obſerve by the way, that ſome French Au-thors, grounded upon a very antiquated right, I mean the ancient Geography, and the diviſion of Gaul men-tioned in Cæſar's Commentaries, were deſirous of adding luſtre to their nation, by declaring Eraſmus to be born in it. Robert Cenalis (5), Biſhop of Avran-ches declared expreſsly, that Eraſmus was a native of France, and that ſhe owes great obligations to him, ut pote homini in Gallia nato. Eraſmus has favoured this pretenſion, he ſaying ſometimes that he was born in Gaul (6), and conſidered the great erudition of Bu-dæus, as a great honour done to France, which he looked upon as his country. Some Germans were jea-lous at this, and therefore humbly beſought Eraſmus not to let France engroſs him to themſelves: Ne pa-tiar ut Gallia ſibi me aſſerat, ſed ingenue fatear Bata-viam eſſe Germaniæ partem, videlicet ne tanta gloria fraudetur (7). His anſwer, in which he ſhews the greateſt affection for Literature, and the greateſt mo-deſty

(1) He was a Phyſician, and named Reynerus Snoyus, (See Journal des Savans, 1690, p. 540.) He pub-liſhed ſeveral books, and had enjoyed very good employments. He was Eraſ-mus's friend. Val. Andreas Deſſelius, Bibl. Belgica, p. 175, ſays, that he read in the Records of the Monaſtery of Stein, where Eraſmus lived many years, what this Snoyus ſays.

(2) p. m. 294. edit. Arnhem. 1616.

(3) In his Amœnitates Theologico-Philologicæ, p. 40, & ſeq. edit. Amſtel. 1694.

(4) See the Letter of Mr. Coſterus a Lawyer, to Mr. Almelo-veen, on this ſubject, inſerted in the Amœnita-tes Theologico-Philologicæ.

A diſpute between Germany and France concern-ing Eraſmus.

(5) Hiſt. Galliæ, lib. 1. fol. 30, 39, 40.

(6) Et priſtinam illam laudem noſ-træ aſſeras Gal-liæ. Nihil enim vetat eundem di-tione Germanum eſſe, & veterum Coſmographorum deſcriptione Gal-lum. Eraſmus, Epiſt. 7. lib. 11.

(7) Idem, Epiſt. 43. lib. 13.

honour the memory of this illuſtrious man [B], who has diffuſed ſuch glory on it [C]. The deſty, is to this effect, that he was born on the confines of Gaul and Germany, but a little nearer the former than the latter. An Batavus ſim non mihi ſatis conſtat. Hollandum eſſe me negare non poſſum, ea in parte natum ut ſi Coſmographorum picturis credimus magis vergat ad Galliam quàm ad Germaniam, quamquam extra controverſiam eſt totam eam regionem in confinio Galliæ Germaniæque eſſe. Hence he ſays in another letter (8), that he does not affirm whether he is a Frenchman, but neither does he deny it; he looking upon it as a doubtful matter. Gallum eſſe me nec aſſevero, nec inficior, ſic natus ut Gallus ne an Germanus ſim anceps haberi poſſit.

(8) Epiſt. 18. lib. 6.

[B] The inhabitants of Rotterdam having taken care to honour the memory of this illuſtrious man.] The city of Rotterdam ordered, 1. That the houſe in which Eraſmus was born ſhould be honoured with an inſcription, to acquaint its inhabitants, and all foreigners, with this glorious prerogative. 2. That the College in which Latin, Greek, and Rhetoric are taught, ſhould be called Eraſmus's College, and dedicated to him in the inſcription of the front. 3. That a ſtatue of wood ſhould be erected to his memory in 1549; and that a ſtone one was ſet up in its place in 1557. The Spaniards having pulled it down in 1572, it was ſet up again (9) as ſoon as the Dutch had freed themſelves from their tyranny; and at laſt a braſs one (10) was erected to his memory in 1622, which is admired by all judges. It ſtands in the great ſquare of the city, on the ſide of a canal, on a pedeſtal adorned with inſcriptions, and with iron rails about it. As the ſubſtance of thoſe different ſtatues roſe, by degrees, in value, Eraſmus had this in common with the deities of old Rome: for not only the offerings of particular perſons were not, at firſt, of very great value,

(9) Verheiden ſays in his Elogiums, that the Spaniſh ſoldiers who were in garriſon at Rotterdam, did not commit thoſe outrages, till they had been inflamed by the invectives which a Monk, their countryman, levelled againſt Eraſmus in a ſermon; and that the Magiſtrates did not ſet up the ſame ſtatue again, but cauſed another to be made.

(10) Quenſtedt, de Patriis illuſtr. Viror. p. 121, is miſtaken, in ſuppoſing it of marble.

Nunc te marmoreum pro tempore fecimus: at tu
Si fœtura gregem ſuppleverit aureus eſto (11).

(11) Virgil. Eclog. 7.

" But if the falling lambs increaſe my fold,
" Thy marble ſtatue ſhall be turn'd to gold."
DRYDEN.

(12) Propert. lib. 4. eleg. 1. ver. 5.

but likewiſe thoſe of cities and whole nations conſiſted, in the beginning, of mean and common things.

Fictilibus crevere Diis hæc aurea templa (12).

" They temples rais'd, of gold, to earthen gods."

(13) Voiage de Munſter, p. 145.

(14) Lib. 2. cap. 54.

(15) This is an error for 1549.

Few travellers who have given an account of what they ſaw in the united Provinces, but ſpeak of Eraſmus's ſtatue. Mr. Joli, a canon of Paris, mentions a particular concerning it which I will tranſcribe here. He had juſt before mentioned this ſtatue, and the houſe in which Eraſmus was born (13), and adds, that the great reputation of Eraſmus makes thoſe two things, though very ſmall, the moſt conſiderable in the city, though in reality they cannot be called ſmall, ſince Sebaſtian Munſter relates, in his Coſmography (14), that Philip King of Spain, ſon to the Emperor Charles V. going in September 1545 (15) to Rotterdam, this ſtatue was ſet up in honour of his joyful coming; that a poem in his honour was put into Eraſmus's hand, in order to be preſented to that Prince (16); and that afterwards the King, Mary Queen of Hungary, and all the Princes who accompanied them, out of love for the memory of ſo great a man, went and viſited reſpectfully the houſe in which he was born. Monconis (17) does not ſay ſo much; he only taking notice of the altitude of the ſtatue, and the inſcriptions fixed on the little houſe; and adds, that Eraſmus found out the uſe of turfs (18), and ſails fitted for all winds, as thoſe of barks and yachts; which ſeems to me as falſe as what he had before ſaid, that the Scheld and the Rhine, joining their waters, flow before the city of Rotterdam, and compaſſing part of it, run into the city by two great canals. But Bullart (19) confirms the paſſage of Mr. Joli, he ſaying, that when Philip II. made a ſolemn entry into the city of Rotterdam, as ſovereign Prince of the Netherlands, the Senate cauſed the ſtatue of Eraſmus to be placed, as their greateſt ornament, before the houſe in which he was born, in an eccleſiaſtical habit, holding a pen in his right hand, and preſenting with his left hand to the Prince, a paper containing the following lines.

(16) Fuit, ſays Munſter, imago Eraſmi ad vivum expreſſa, adventi (Philippo) oppoſita, quæ exerto brachio gratulatorium carmen Principi offerebat.

(17) Voiage, part 2. p. 129, 130. All theſe errors of Monconis, are in a book printed in 1692, and entitled, Teatro Belgico. See there the part relating to Rotterdam.

(18) Æneas Silvius mentions turfs, in a book publiſhed by him in 1458. See Martinus Schoockius de Turffis, p. 3.

(19) Bullart, Acad. des Scienc. vol. 2. p. 162.

Sereniſſimo Hiſpaniarum Principi D. Philippo à Burgundia Deſiderius Eraſmus Rotterodamus.

Rotterodamus ego non inficiabor Eraſmus,
Ne videar cives deſeruiſſe meos.
Ipſorum inſtinctu, Princeps clariſſime, ſalvum
Ingreſſum precor ad limina noſtra tuum,
Atque hunc quo poſſum ſtudio, commendo popellum
Maxime præſidiis Cæſare nate tuis.
Te Dominum agnoſcunt omnes, te Principe gaudent
Nec quicquam toto charius orbe tenent.

" To the moſt Serene Prince, of Spain, Philip of " Burgundy, Deſiderius Eraſmus of Rotterdam.

" Eraſmus I from Rotterdam am call'd,
" That I my countrymen may not deny.
" At their requeſt, great Prince, I here thee hail,
" And bid thee welcome to their joyful city.
" Great Cæſar's ſon, to thy auſpicious arm;
" To thy protection, ſuppliant, now they fly.
" Thee, mighty Prince, the people all acknow" ledge;
" And thee prefer to all terreſtrial things."

I will obſerve, that Mr. Joli might have cited a more authentick Author, with regard to this incident, than Sebaſtian Munſter; I mean the Spaniſh relation of the journey of Don Philip, Prince of Spain, written by Juan Chriſtoval Caluete of Eſtrella. It is alſo to be obſerved, that in 1672, the populace mutinying in moſt parts of the province of Holland, Rotterdam was during ſome days at their diſpoſal; and, during this anarchy, Eraſmus's ſtatue was taken from its place, as ſavouring of popery. It was carried to a publick houſe, and there the rabble deliberated whether it would not be proper to melt it down. The Magiſtrates of Baſil had no ſooner heard of this, but they ordered ſome Merchants in their city, to deſire one of their correſpondents in Rotterdam, to purchaſe that ſtatue at a certain price. The correſpondent accordingly treated about, and had like to have purchaſed it. Having given an account of his commiſſion, freſh orders were ſent him to pay the Magiſtrates of Rotterdam the full price they demanded; but they had bethought themſelves in the mean time, and concluded, that it would not be proper either to ſell or melt down that ſtatue, but put it up again where it had before ſtood, which was accordingly performed. I was told this two days ago (20) by the Merchant who had the commiſſion from the Magiſtrates of Baſil to purchaſe it.

(20) I write this the 28th of July 1699.

[C] . . . . who has diffuſed ſuch glory on it.] There are few Authors who write any particulars concerning Eraſmus's life, but take notice of the honours he reflected on his native country. Du Verdier Vau-Privas (21), and Bullart (22), take notice of this circumſtance firſt, in their elogium of this youth of Rotterdam. Rhenanus's words, on this occaſion, are ſo beautiful, that I cannot forbear tranſcribing them. Natus eſt, ſay he to the Emperor Charles V (23), abavi tui Friderici III. Aug. primis imperii annis ad quintum Calend. Novembris, Roterodami in Hollandia tua inferioris Germaniæ Provincia, quam olim Batavi poſſederunt, nunc magis notam ſtudioſis omnibus ob unius indigenæ Eraſmi incunabula, quam veterum incolarum memoria quamlibet bellico robore præſtantium. Hoc alumno Roterodamum oppidum ſe ſemper jactabit, & doctis erit commendatum, i. e. " He was born the 26th of October,
" about the beginning of the reign of Frederick III.
" your renowned anceſtor, at Rotterdam, your pro" vince of Lower Germany, anciently poſſeſſed by
" the Batavi; but in this age better known to all the " learned, for having given birth to Eraſmus, than
" for the renowned martial exploits of its ancient " inhabitants,

(21) Proſopogr. Tom. 3. p. 2389.

(22) Acad. des Sciences, Tom. 2. p. 159.

(23) Epiſtola præfixa Operibus Eraſmi. See alſo Quenſtedt, p. 121, of his dialogue de Patriis illuſtrium doctrina & ſcriptis Virorum.

The Admiralty of the Meuſe is in that city.

" inhabitants. The city of Rotterdam will ever glory " in ſuch a birth, and be valued for it by men of " learning." I could quote many authors, who, to heighten the glory of Rotterdam, join the two following circumſtances together, firſt, that it is the birth-place of the famous Eraſmus; and ſecondly, that this city ſet up a ſtatue in his honour.

ROVENIUS (PHILIP), Archbiſhop of Philippe, and Apoſtolical Vicar in the United Provinces, was born at Deventer (a). He publiſhed ſeveral works, and one among the reſt De Republica Chriſtiana, printed in 1648. I ſhall cite a paſſage from it, to ſhew the ſtrange jargon, which he greatly condemns, of ſome female devotees [A].

(a) Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. p. 778.

[A] The ſtrange jargon, which he greatly condemns, of ſome female devotees.] He writes as follows concerning ſome nuns, who affected certain exerciſes of devotion and ſpirituality (1): Non raro etiam ſuperbium aliquam conjunctam habent, ut ambulent in magnis & mirabilibus ſuper ſe, ut vileſcant illis ordinaria pietatis exercitia approbata ab Eccleſia, vel à Patribus commendata: nihil crepent niſi uniones cum Deo, cum uniantur proprio (ſi non pejori) ſpiritui: jactant tranſubſtantiationes myſticas, cordis concentrationes: potentiarum, imo omnis ſui eſſe, annihilationem, connubium eſſentiæ creatæ & Divinitatis: ſpirituale Sacramentum inſeparabilitatis, ſomnium omnium affectionum, abſorptionem & liquefactionem in amplexu ſponſi, triplicem animæ hierarchiam, orationem in quiete paſſiva, ebrietatem ſpiritualem, cordis ſilentium, meditationes negativas, uniones ſupereſſentiales, puteum & gurgitem annihilationis, amorem Deificum, transformantem, unientem, ſtringentem, amplexantem, ſuavitatem, cor auferentem, ſugentem ſponſi ubera, ruminantem collum, abſorbentem enthuſiaſmum, inſenſibilitatem & oblivionem omnium inducentem abyſſalem cum Deo identificationem, confricationem Deificam, incendentem & conſumentem cor: elevationem ad ſuavitatem cæleſtem ex infernali languore, introverſionem ſuper cæleſtem, caliginem, & umbram Dei, allocutiones internas, elevationes incognitas, extenſiones & applicationes amoroſas, animæ ſuſpenſiones, deliquium, ſuſpiria, mortem ſenſuum & omnium affectuum, ecſtaſim continuam, juſtitium ratiocinii, cordis contactum & patefactionem, liquefactionem, influxum, inflammationem, aſſultus qui ferri nequeant, penetrationes ad intima, vulnerationes, conſtrictiones, alligationes inſeparabiles, aſpectus penetrantes & oblectantes, voces tremulas, murmura columbina, guſtus ſuaviſſimos, odores gratiſſimos, auditus melodiæ cæleſtis, hypermyſticas Dei & animæ perichoreſes, impudentiam ſpiritualem, aſpirationes Myſanthropicas, ignem ſine carbone, flammam ſine corpore, holocauſtum meridianum in viſcerali & medullari penetrabilitate, contactum mirabilem & ſuaviſſimum, obſcuræ noctis gaudia & caliginem. Hæc & ſimilia ſeſquipedalia verba in nova pietatis ſchola inter ſponte electos Magiſtros, & diſcipulas curioſas, adeo frequenter tenero proferuntur palato, ut intimis in viſceribus ſentiantur (2), i. e. " They frequently alſo ſhew a pride in attempting " to do great and ſurpriſing things, above the reach " of their abilities; whence they contemn the uſual " exerciſes of piety approved by the church, and " recommended by the Fathers. Their whole talk " is concerning their union with God, at the ſame " time that this union is only with their own ſpirit, " if not with a worſe: they boaſt of myſtical tranſub- " ſtantiations, concentrations of the heart, the annihi- " lation of powers, nay, of their whole being; the " marriage between created eſſence and the deity; " the ſpiritual ſacrament of inſeparability; the dream " of all the affections; the abſorption and diſſolv- " ing in the ſpouſe's embrace; the triple hierarchy " of the ſoul; prayer in paſſive quietude, ſpiritual " ebriety, ſilence of heart, negative meditations, ſu- " pereſſential unions, the well and whirl-pool of an- " nihilation, love that deifies, transforms, unites, " preſſes, embraces; ſweetneſs that raviſhes the " ſoul, ſucking the ſpouſe's breaſts, a ruminating " neck, an abſorbent enthuſiaſm; inſenſibility and " oblivion of all things, producing an abyſſal indem- " nification with God; deific confrication, firing and " conſuming the heart; an elevation * to celeſtial ſweet- " neſs from an infernal languor; ſuperceleſtial in- " troverſion; darkneſs and ſhadow of God; internal " allocutions, unknown elevations, amorous ſtretch- " ings and applications; ſuſpenſions of the ſoul, " fainting away, ſighs; death of all the ſenſes and " paſſions; uninterrupted extaſy; a ceſſation of rea- " ſoning; the contact and opening of the heart; diſ- " ſolving, flowing in, inflammation, inſupportable " leapings-up, penetration to the inward receſſes; " wounds; faſt bindings; inſeparable allegations, " looks that penetrate and delight, tremulous words, " dove-like murmurs, ſweeteſt taſtes, moſt grateful " odours; ſounds of celeſtial melody; ſupermyſtical " walks of God and the ſoul; ſpiritual impudence; " myſanthropic breathings; fire without coal; flame " without a body; a meridian burnt-ſacrifice in a " viſceral and medullar penetrability; a wonderful " and moſt delightful contact; joys and darkneſs of " obſcure night. Theſe and ſuch like high-ſound- " ing words are frequently ſpoke, in this new ſchool " of piety by the choſen maſters and inquiſitive ſhe- " diſciples, with ſo tremulous a voice, that they are " felt in the moſt intimate receſſes of their hearts."

(1) Philip. Rovenius, de Republ. Chriſtiana, lib. 1. cap. 43. p. 278.

(2) Dr. Stillingfleet has collected ſome ſuch like phraſes of myſtical Writers. See his treatiſe concerning the fanaticiſm of the Church of Rome, p. m. 240, 307, & ſeq. See the like jargon, in rem. [K] of the art. BRACHMANS.

* Note, the original of theſe words, viz. Deificam incendentem & conſumentem cor: elevationem, are omitted, p. 931. col. 2. Tom. 4. of the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. There are a vaſt number of errors in that edit.] Rem. by the Tranſl.

☞ ROWE (NICHOLAS), deſcended from an ancient family in Devonſhire [A], and ſon of John Rowe, Eſq; Serjeant at Law [B], was born at Little Berkford in Bedfordſhire, at the houſe of Jaſpar Edwards, Eſq; his mother's father, in the year 1673 (a). He began his education at a private grammar-ſchool in High-gate (b); but the taſte he had there of the claſſic Authors was improved and finiſhed under the care of the famous Dr. Buſby in Weſtminſter-ſchool, where about the age of twelve years he was choſen one of the King's ſcholars. Beſides his ſkill in the Latin and Greek languages, he had made a tolerable proficiency in the Hebrew; but poetry was his early bent

(a) Preface to Mr. Rowe's Tranſlation of Lucan, by James Welwood, M. D. p. 18. edit. Lond. 1718. in fol.

(b) Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Nicb. Rowe, Eſq; by Dr. George Sewell, prefixed to the Miſcellaneous Works of Mr. Rowe.

[A] Deſcended of a good family in Devonſhire.] This family had for many ages made an handſome figure in that county, and was known by the name of the Rowe's of Lambertoun. Mr. Rowe could trace his anceſtors in a direct line up to the times of the holy war, where one of them ſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the Holy Land, that at his return he had the arms given him, which they have borne ever ſince, that being in thoſe days all the reward of military virtue, or of blood ſpilt in theſe expeditions. From that time downward to Mr. Rowe's father, the family kept themſelves to the frugal management of a private fortune, and the innocent pleaſures of a country life. Having an handſome ſeat and a competent eſtate, they lived beyond the fear of want, or reach of envy. In all the changes of Governments, they are ſaid to have ever leaned towards the ſide of publick liberty, and in that retired ſituation of life to have beheld with grief and concern the many encroachments that have been made in it from time to time (1).

[B] John Rowe, Eſq; Serjeant at Law.] He was the firſt of the family, who changed a country life for a literal profeſſion. After he had paſſed the ſchools at home, he was brought up to London, and entered a ſtudent of the law in the Middle-Temple, where ſometime after he was called to the bar, and at length made Serjeant at law. He was a Gentleman

(1) Dr. Welwood's Preface to Mr. Rowe's Tranſlation of Lucan, p. 18.

bent and darling ſtudy. He compoſed at that time ſeveral copies of verſes upon different ſubjects both in Greek and Latin, and ſome in Engliſh, which were much admired, and the more that they came with very little pains, and ſeemed to flow from his imagination, almoſt as faſt as his pen. His father, deſigning him for his own profeſſion, took him from that ſchool, when he was about ſixteen years of age, and entered him a ſtudent in the Middle-Temple, whereof himſelf was a Member, that he might have him under his immediate care and inſtruction. Being capable of any part of knowledge he applied his mind to, he made very remarkable advances in the ſtudy of the law; and was not content to know it as a collection of Statutes or Cuſtoms only, but as a ſyſtem founded upon right reaſon, and calculated for the good of mankind. Being afterwards called to the bar, he appeared in as promiſing a way to make a figure in that profeſſion, as any of his Contemporaries, if the love of the Belles Lettres, and that of poetry in particular, had not ſtopped him in his career. He had the advantage of the friendſhip and protection of the fineſt Gentlemen, as well as one of the greateſt Lawyers of that time, Sir George Treby, Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas, who was fond of him to a great degree, and had it both in his power and inclination to promote his intereſt (c). But the ſpirit of poetry ſoon got the aſcendant over him, and his firſt Tragedy, The Ambitious Step-Mother [C], meeting with univerſal applauſe, he laid aſide all thoughts of riſing by the law; and afterwards wrote ſeveral Tragedies [D], and a Comedy [E], and a great many copies of verſes upon different ſubjects [F]. Being a great admirer of Shakeſpeare, he obliged the publick with a new edition of his works, and prefixed to it a ſhort account of his life. But Mr. Rowe's laſt, and perhaps his beſt poem is his tranſlation of Lucan [G], which he juſt lived to finiſh. The love of learning and poetry made him not leſs fit for buſineſs, and no body applied himſelf cloſer to it, when it required his attendance.

(c) Welwood, ubi ſupra, p. 18, 19.

man in great eſteem for many engaging qualities, of very conſiderable practice at the bar, and ſtood very fair for the firſt vacancy on the bench, when he died April the 7th 1692, and was buried in the Temple Church May the 7th following. Let it be mentioned to the honour of this Gentleman, that when he publiſhed Serjeant Benloe's and Judge Deliſon's Reports, he had the honeſty and boldneſs to obſerve in the Preface, how moderate theſe two great Lawyers had been in their opinions concerning the extent of the Royal Prerogative; and that he durſt do this in the reign of King James II. at a time when a diſpenſing Power was ſet up as inherent in the Crown (2).

(2) Dr. Welwood's Preface to Mr. Rowe's Tranſlation of Lucan, p. 18, 19.

[C] His firſt Tragedy, The Ambitious Step-Mother.] It was acted at the Theatre in Lincoln's-Inn Fields, and dedicated to the Earl of Jerſey. Mr. Rowe wrote it, when he was but twenty five years of age, and as a trial only of his genius that way. The purity of the language, the juſtneſs of his characters, the noble elevation of the ſentiments, were all of them admirably adapted to the plan of the play (3).

(3) Idem, ibid. p. 20.

[D] Several other Tragedies.] The Tragedy, which he valued himſelf moſt upon, and which was moſt valued, was his Tamerlane, acted at the Theatre in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, and dedicated to the Marquis of Hartington. "In this play, ſays Dr. Welwood (4), he aimed at a parallel between the late King "William of immortal memory and Tamerlane; "as alſo between Bajazet and a Monarch who is "ſince dead (5). That glorious ambition and noble "order in Tamerlane to break the chains of enſlaved "nations, and ſet mankind free from the encroach-"ments of lawleſs power, are painted in the moſt "lively as well as the moſt amiable colours. On the "other ſide, his manner of introducing on the ſtage "a Prince, that thinks mankind is made but for "him, and whoſe chief aim is to perpetuate his "name to poſterity by that havock and ruin he "ſcatters through the world, are all drawn with that "pomp of horror and deteſtation, which ſuch "monſtrous actions do deſerve. And ſince nothing "could be more calculated for raiſing in the minds "of the audience a true paſſion for liberty, and a "juſt abhorrence of ſlavery, how this play came "to be diſcouraged next to a prohibition in the lat-"ter end of a late reign (6), I leave it to others to "give a reaſon."

(4) Ibid. p. 20.

(5) Lewis XIV. of France.

(6) That of Q. Anne.

Mr. Rowe's other Tradigies were, The Fair Penitent, acted at the Theatre in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, and dedicated to the Dutcheſs of Ormonde; Ulyſſes, acted at the Queen's Theatre in the Hay-Market, and dedicated to Charles Earl of Halifax; The Tragedy of Jane Shore, written in imitation of Shakeſpeare's ſtyle, and acted at the Theatre Royal in Drury-Lane, and dedicated to the Duke of Queenſberry and Dover; and The Tragedy of the Lady Jane Grey, acted at the Theatre Royal in Drury-Lane, and dedicated to her Royal Highneſs the Princeſs of Wales. His plays were collected into two volumes in 8vo, and dedicated to the Earl of Warwick. It may be juſtly ſaid of all our Author's Tragedies, "that never Poet painted virtue or reli-"gion in a more charming dreſs on the ſtage, nor "were ever vice or impiety better expoſed to con-"tempt and hatred. There runs through every one "of them an air of religion and virtue, attended "with all the ſocial duties of life, and a conſtant and "untainted love of his country. The ſame princi-"ples of liberty he had early imbibed himſelf, and "ſeemed a part of his conſtitution, appeared in "every thing he wrote, and he took all occaſions "that fell in his way to make the ſtage ſubſervient "to them. His muſe was ſo religiouſly chaſte, that "I do not remember, continues Dr. Welwood (7), "one word in any of his plays or writings, that "might admit but of a double entendre in point of "decency or morals. There is nothing to be found "in them to humour the depraved taſte of the age "by nibling at ſcripture, or depreciating things in "themſelves ſacred. And it was the leſs wonder, "that he obſerved this rule in his Dramatic perfor-"mances, ſince in his ordinary converſation, and "when his mirth and humour enlivened the whole "company, he uſed to expreſs his diſſatisfaction, in "the ſevereſt manner, with any thing that looked "that way. Being much converſant in the Holy "Scriptures, it is obſervable, that to raiſe the high-"eſt ideas of virtue, he has with great art in ſeveral "of his Tragedies made uſe of thoſe expreſſions and "metaphors in them, that taſte moſt of the ſub-"lime."

(7) Ubi ſupra, p. 20.

[E] A Comedy.] It was entitled The Biter, and contained three acts, and was performed at the Theatre in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, but without ſucceſs, for Mr. Rowe's genius did not lye towards Comedy.

[F] A great many copies of verſes upon different ſubjects.] They were publiſhed together at London in one volume in 12mo. the third edition of which was printed in 1733, under the title Of the Miſcellaneous Works of Nicholas Rowe, Eſq; To which is added Mr. Rowe's tranſlation of Quillet's Callipædia.

[G] His tranſlation of Lucan.] It was publiſhed at London 1728, in folio. The language of this tranſlation is pure, and the verſification both muſical and adapted to the ſubjects. "I have no reaſon "to attendance. The late Duke of Queenſberry, when he was Secretary of State, made him Secretary for publick Affairs, and when that truly great man came to know him well, he was never ſo pleaſed as when Mr. Rowe was in his company. After the Duke's death, all avenues were ſtopped to his preferment, and during the reſt of Queen Anne's reign, he paſt his time with the muſes and his books, and ſometimes the converſation of his friends (d). We are told indeed (e), that he went one day to pay his Court to the Earl of Oxford, Lord High Treaſurer of England, who aſked him, if he underſtood Spaniſh well? He anſwered, no; but thinking, that his Lordſhip might intend to ſend him into Spain on ſome honourable commiſſion, he preſently added, that in a ſhort time he did not doubt but he ſhould be able both to underſtand it and ſpeak it. The Earl approving of what he ſaid, Mr. Rowe took his leave, and immediately retired out of town to a private country farm, and within a few months he learnt the Spaniſh tongue, and then waited again on the Earl to give him an account of his diligence. His Lordſhip aſking him, if he was ſure he underſtood it thoroughly, and Mr. Rowe anſwering in the affirmative, the Earl burſt into an exclamation; How happy are you, Mr. Rowe, that you can enjoy the pleaſure of reading and underſtanding the Hiſtory of Don Quixot in the original? Upon the acceſſion of King George I. to the throne, he was made Poet Laureate, and one of the Land Surveyors of the Cuſtoms in the Port of London. The Prince of Wales conferred on him the place of Clerk of his Council, and the Lord Chancellor Parker made him his Secretary for the Preſentations the very day he received the Seals, and without his aſking it. He was twice married, firſt to a daughter of Mr. Auditor Parſons, and afterwards to a daughter of Mr. Deveniſh of a good family in Dorſetſhire. By his firſt wife he had a ſon, and by the ſecond a daughter. He died December the 6th 1718. in the 45th year of his age, like a Chriſtian and a Philoſopher

(d) Welwood, ubi ſupra, p. 19, 20, 21, 24.

(e) Life of Michael de Cervantes Saavedra. Written by Don Gregorio Mayans and Siſcar, his Catholick Majeſty's Library-Keeper, §. 145.

(8) Ubi ſupra, p. 22.

" to doubt, ſays Dr. Welwood (8), but the true " meaning of the original is faithfully preſerved " through the whole work; and if I may venture to " judge, the tranſlation comes up to the ſpirit of the " original, as far as the difference between the Ro- " man and Engliſh languages will allow of . . . . . " I know May has tranſlated it near an age ago, " and I confeſs it is many years ſince I read it. But " it muſt be owned, that it is but a lame perfor- " mance, and does not reach the ſpirit or ſenſe of " Lucan. The language and verſification are yet " worſe, and fall infinitely ſhort of the lofty num- " bers and propriety of expreſſion in which Mr. " Rowe excells. I know of no other tranſlation of " Lucan in any of the living languages, in verſe, " except that of Brebeuf in French. I have a very " great value for it and the Author, if it were for " no other reaſon, but that he had the honeſt bold- " neſs to publiſh ſuch a work in his native language, " that was diametrically oppoſite to the maxims of " Government purſued by the Prince then reigning. " His courage in this matter deſerves yet the more to " be applauded, that when all the other claſſics were " publiſhed for the uſe of the Dauphin, Lucan alone " was prohibited. It is obſervable, he has carried " in ſome places in the French language the heat of " Lucan farther than Lucan himſelf in the Latin; " and that by attempting the fire of his Author, " he has, if I may be allowed the expreſſion, fired " himſelf much more. This is what happens to him " frequently. But again at other times he flags; " and when Lucan happily hits on the true beauty of " a thought, Brebeuf falls infinitely below him, " through an affectation of appearing eaſy and natu- " ral. I might give a great many inſtances of this " laſt, but ſhall confine myſelf to one which will " ſet in a true light the difference between the two " tranſlations of Lucan by Brebeuf and Mr. Rowe. " That ſtrong celebrated line in Lucan,

" Victrix cauſa Diis placuit, ſed victa Catoni,

" is with the whole period thus done by Mr. Rowe " tho' none of the brighteſt lines in his tranſlation:

" Juſtly to name the better cauſe were hard,
" While greateſt names for either ſide declar'd:
" Victorious Cæſar by the Gods was crown'd,
" The vanquiſh'd party was by Cato own'd.

" When Brebeuf comes to tranſlate this paſſage, he " does it after this manner:

" De ſi hauts partiſans s'arment pour chacun d'eux,
" Qu'on ne ſcait qui defendre, ou qui blamer des deux,
" Qui des deux à mieux plus juſtement l'epée;
" Les Dieux ſervent Cæſar, & Caton ſuit Pompée.

What can be poorer than this laſt? It does not an- " ſwer the nobleneſs of the Latin; and beſides, it " maims the ſenſe of the Author. For Lucan, who " had his imagination full of the virtue of Cato, in- " tended to raiſe him above, or at leaſt equal him " to the Gods, as to the merits of the cauſe, that oc- " caſioned the oppoſition. But Brebeuf, inſtead of " raiſing him to a competition with the Gods, makes " him only a Retainer of Pompey's. This puts me in " mind of an obſervation I have frequently made " upon moſt of our Engliſh tranſlations: wherever " there happens an expreſſion or period of diſtin- " guiſhed beauty, it is there they fall often not " only ſhort of the original, but miſtake intirely the " ſenſe. I ſhall give but one inſtance in Dryden's " Virgil. There is not in all the inimitable Æneid a " more beautiful period, than that in the ſixth book " concerning Marcellus, which Virgil ſums up in " this hemiſtichon:

Tu Marcellus eris.

" Dryden turns it thus;

" O! couldſt thou break thro' fate's ſevere decree,
" A new Marcellus ſhall ariſe in thee.

" which is altogether wide from the meaning of " Virgil, and ſinks infinitely below the dignity of " verſe." I might take notice here of ſeveral paſſages of Lucan left out in Brebeuf, which well deſerved a place in his tranſlation. I ſhall only mention one in the ſixth book concerning the witch Erictho, which in my opinion is a very beautiful picture of Horror. Brebeuf cuts it ſhort, and in its place gives us a love-ſtory of his own invention, between Burrhus and Octavia, which is nothing to the purpoſe, and falls infinitely ſhort of the ſpirit of Lucan. Yet after all it cannot be denied, but Brebeuf's performance is in the main admirably well done, and in many places he appears animated with the ſame fire we find in Lucan. I cannot omit one inſtance of this, in that paſſage of the third book concerning the origin of authors, which is one of the fineſt in Lucan, and excellently done into French by Brebeuf. Lucan has it thus:

Phœnices primi, famæ ſi creditur, auſi
Manſuram rudibus vocem ſignare figuris.

Brebeuf turns it after this manner;

C'eſt de luy que nous vient cet art ingenieux
De peindre la parole & de parler aux yeux,
Et par des traits divers des figures trucées
Donner de la couleur & du corps aux penſées.

Philoſopher in charity with all mankind, and with an abſolute reſignation to the will of God. He kept up his good humour to the laſt, and took leave of his wife and friends, immediately before his laſt agony, with the ſame tranquillity of mind, and the ſame indifference, as though he had been upon taking but a ſhort journey. He was interred on the 19th of December in Weſtminſter-Abbey, over againſt Chaucer, his body being attended by a ſelect number of his friends, and the Dean and Chapter officiating at the funeral (f). Mr. Pope wrote an epitaph for a tomb intended to be erected there to his memory by his wife [H]. We ſhall give his character in the remark [I].

(f) Welwood, ubi ſupra, p. 24, 25.

The tranſlation of this paſſage by Brebeuf is excellently imitated by a young Lady (9), that I had the honour to be acquainted with, which, if I miſtake not, tranſcends Brebeuf, or even Lucan himſelf. It is thus:

(9) A daughter of the Viſcount Moleſworth.

The noble art from Cadmus took it riſe
Of painting words, and ſpeaking to the eyes.
He firſt in wond'rous magic fetters bound
The airy voice, and ſtop'd the flying ſound.
The various figures by his pencil wrought,
Gave colour and a body to the thought.

[H] Mr. Pope wrote an epitaph for a tomb intended to be erected there to his memory by his wife.] It is as follows:

" Thy reliques, Rowe, to this fair urn we truſt,
" And ſacred place by Dryden's awful duſt.
" Beneath a rude and nameleſs ſtone he lyes,
" To which thy tomb ſhall guide inquiring eyes.
" Peace to thy gentle ſhade, and endleſs reſt!
" Bleſt in thy genius, in thy love be bleſt!
" One grateful woman in thy fame ſupplies
" What a whole thankleſs land to his denies."

[I] We ſhall give his character in the remark.] As to his perſon, it was graceful and well made, his face regular and of a manly beauty. As his ſoul was well lodged, ſo its rational and animal faculties excelled in a high degree. He had a quick and fruitful invention, a deep penetration, and a large compaſs of thought, with a ſingular dexterity and eaſineſs in making his thoughts to be underſtood. He was maſter of moſt parts of polite learning, eſpecially the claſſical authors, both Greek and Latin; underſtood the French, Italian, and Spaniſh languages, and ſpoke the firſt fluently, and the other two tolerably well. He had likewiſe read moſt of the Greek and Roman hiſtories in their original languages, and moſt that are writ in Engliſh, French, Italian, and Spaniſh. He had a good taſte in Philoſophy; and having a firm impreſſion of religion upon his mind, he took a delight in Divinity and Eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, in both which he made great advances in the times he retired into the country, which were frequent. He expreſſed on all occaſions his full perſuaſion of the truth of revealed religion; and being a ſincere Member of the eſtabliſhed church himſelf, he pitied, but condemned not, thoſe that diſſented from it. He abhorred the principle of perſecuting men upon the account of their opinions in religion; and being ſtrict in his own, he took it not upon him to cenſure thoſe of another perſuaſion. His converſation was pleaſant, witty, and learned, without the leaſt tincture of affectation or pedantry; and his inimitable manner of diverting and enlivening the company, made it impoſſible for any one to be out of humour, when he was in it. Envy and detraction ſeemed to be entirely foreign to his conſtitution; and whatever provocations he met with at any time, he paſt them over without the leaſt thought of reſentment or revenge. As Homer had a Zoilus, ſo Mr. Rowe had ſometimes his; for there were not wanting malevolent people, and pretenders to poetry too, that would now and then bark at his beſt performances; but he was ſo much conſcious of his own genius, and had ſo much good nature as to forgive them, nor could he ever be tempted to return them an anſwer (10). Mr. Pope, in a letter to Edward Blount, Eſq; dated February the 10th, 1715-6, obſerves, that there was a vivacity and gaity of diſpoſition almoſt peculiar to Mr. Rowe, which made it impoſſible to part from him, without that uneaſineſs, which generally ſucceeds all our pleaſures.

(10) Welwood, ubi ſupra, p. 244

☞ ROWE (ELIZABETH), an Engliſh Lady eminent for her excellent writings both in proſe and verſe, was born at Ilcheſter in Somerſetſhire, September 11. 1674, being the eldeſt of three daughters of Mr. Walter Singer, a Gentleman of a good family [A], and Mrs. Elizabeth Portnell, both of them perſons of very great worth and piety (a). Of Mrs. Rowe's two ſiſters, one died in childhood; the other ſurvived to her twentieth year, a lovely concurrent in the race of virtue and glory (b) [B]. Thoſe who were acquainted with the extraordinary perſon, who is the ſubject of this article, in her childiſh

(a) Life of Mrs. Elizabeth Rowe, p. 4. prefixed to the firſt vol. of her Miſcellaneous Works, edit. Lond. 1739, in 8vo.

(b) Ibid. p. 9.

[A] Mr. Walter Singer, a Gentleman of a good family.] He was not a native of Ilcheſter, nor an inhabitant before his impriſonment there for Non-conformity in the reign of King Charles II. Mrs. Portnell thinking herſelf obliged to viſit thoſe who ſuffered on that account, from hence that acquaintance commenced, which terminated in the nuptial union. During the life of his wife Mr. Singer reſided at Ilcheſter; but ſoon after her deceaſe removed into the neighbourhood of Frome in the ſame county, where he became ſo well known and diſtinguiſhed for his good ſenſe, primitive integrity, ſimplicity of manners, uncommon prudence, activity, and faithfulneſs in diſcharging the duties of his ſtation, inflexible adherence to his principles, and at the ſame time truly Catholic ſpirit, as to be held in high eſteem, even by perſons of ſuperior rank; the Lord Weymouth, who was reckoned a very good judge of men, not only writing to him, but honouring him with his viſits; as did the devout Biſhop Kenn very frequently, ſometimes once a week, ſuch a charm is there in unaffected goodneſs, and ſo naturally do kindred ſouls, warmed and actuated by the ſame heavenly paſſion, and purſuing the ſame end, run and mingle together with the greateſt pleaſure, after they are once acquainted, notwithſtanding any accidental diverſity of ſentiments in ſome ſmaller things (1). But the publick will be beſt pleaſed with the character of this good man, as drawn by his daughter, after her beautiful and eaſy manner, in one of her familiar letters to a friend. " I have " eaſe and plenty to the extent of my wiſhes, and " can form deſires of nothing but what my father's " indulgence would procure; and I aſk nothing of " Heaven but the good old man's life. The perfect " ſanctity of his life, and the benevolence of his " temper, make him a refuge to all in diſtreſs, to " the widow and fatherleſs. The people load him " with bleſſings and prayers whenever he goes a- " broad, which he never does but to reconcile his " neighbours, or to right the injured and oppreſſed; " the reſt of his hours are entirely devoted to his " private devotions, and to books, which are his " perpetual entertainment." He died Auguſt the 18th 1719 (2).

(1) Life of Mrs. Eliz. Rowe, p. 4, 5.

(2) Ibid. p. 6.

[B] The other ſurvived to her twentieth year, a lovely concurrent in the race of virtue and glory.] She had the ſame extreme paſſion for books, chiefly thoſe of medicine, in which art ſhe arrived to a conſiderable inſight; and if it could not be ſaid of her and her eldeſt childiſh years, could not but have obſerved a great many things common in that age of life, which then promiſed the bright day, that afterwards enſued. She received the firſt ſerious impreſſions of religion probably as ſoon as ſhe was capable of it [C]; at once perceiving her obligations to the Author of her Being, and in the ſame meaſure, as her opening reaſon diſcovered theſe to her, feeling the force of them (c). There is ſo great a ſimilitude between painting and poetry, that it is no ways ſurpriſing, that one who poſſeſſed the latter of theſe faculties in ſo high a degree of perfection, did very early diſcover an inclination to the other; which has often the ſame Followers, perhaps always the ſame Admirers. Accordingly Mrs. Rowe loved the pencil, when ſhe had hardly ſtrength and ſteadineſs of hand ſufficient to guide it; and in her infancy (one may almoſt venture to ſay ſo) would ſqueeze out the juices of herbs to ſerve inſtead of colours. Her father perceiving her fondneſs for this art, was at the expence of a maſter to inſtruct her in it; and it never ceaſed to be her amuſement at all times, till her death. She was alſo, what every one acquainted with her writings will ſuppoſe of ſuch a well-turned ſoul, very much delighted with muſic, chiefly of the grave and ſolemn kind, as beſt ſuited to the grandeur of her ſentiments, and the ſublimity of her devotion. But her ſtrongeſt bent was to poetry and writing. Poetry indeed was her favourite employment in youth, her moſt diſtinguiſhing excellence. So prevalent was her genius this way, that her very proſe hath all the charms of verſe without the fetters, the ſame fire and elevation, the ſame bright images, bold figures, rich and flowing diction. She could hardly write a familiar letter, but it bore the ſtamp of the Poet. One of her acquaintance remembers to have heard her ſay, that ſhe began to write verſes at twelve years old, which was almoſt as ſoon as ſhe could write at all. In the year 1696, the 22d year of her age, a collection of her poems on various occaſions was publiſhed at the deſire of two of her friends [D], which we may ſuppoſe did not contain all that ſhe had by her, ſince the ingenious Prefacer gives the reader to hope, that the Author might in a little while be prevailed with to oblige the world with a ſecond part, no way inferior to the former (d). What firſt introduced her into the notice of the noble family at Longleat, was a little copy of verſes of hers, with which they were ſo highly delighted as to expreſs a curioſity to ſee her; and the friendſhip that commenced from that time, ſubſiſted ever after, not more to her honour, who was the favourite of perſons ſo much ſuperior to her in the outward diſtinctions of life, than to the praiſe of her judgment and taſte, who knew how to prize, and took a pleaſure to cheriſh ſuch blooming worth. She was not then twenty. Her Paraphraſe on the 38th Chapter of Job was written at the requeſt of Biſhop Kenn, who was entertained in that family, and gained her a great deal of reputation. She had no other tutor for the French and Italian languages, than the honourable Mr. Thynne, ſon to the Lord Viſcount Weymouth, and Father to the Right Honourable the Counteſs of Hartford, who willingly took the taſk upon himſelf, and had the pleaſure to ſee his fair ſcholar improve ſo faſt under his leſſons, that in a few months ſhe was able to read Taſſo's Jeruſalem with great eaſe. Her ſhining merit with the charms of her perſon and converſation, had procured her a great many admirers. Among others, it is ſaid, the famous Mr. Prior made his addreſſes to her; ſo that allowing for the double licenſe of the Poet and Lover in the manner of expreſſion, the concluding lines in his anſwer to Mrs. Singer's Paſtoral

(c) Life of Mrs. Eliz. Rowe, p. 10, 11.

(d) Ibid. p. 11—16.

eldeſt ſiſter, in the letter, as of the virtuous woman in the Proverbs, that their candle went not out by night, yet it frequently burnt till after the middle of it; ſo great was their thirſt of knowledge, and the pleaſure they had of gratifying it (3).

(3) Life of Mrs. Eliz. Rowe, p. 9, 10.

[C] She received the firſt ſerious impreſſions of religion, probably as ſoon as ſhe was capable of it.] In one of her pious addreſſes ſhe herſelf thus ſpeaks to God: My infant-hands were early lifted up to thee, and I ſoon learned to know and acknowledge the God of my fathers (4).

(4) Devout Exerciſes of the Heart, &c. p. 36.

[D] In the year 1696, the 22*d of her age, a collection of her poems on various occaſions was publiſhed at the deſire of two of her friends.*] They were publiſhed under the title of Poems on ſeveral Occaſions. By PHILOMELA. The Preface ſigned Elizabeth Johnſon is dated from Harding's Rents, May the 10th 1696; and the Author vindicating her ſex againſt thoſe of the men, who would monopolize ſenſe, wit, learning and genius, writes thus: "Nor is "our defenſeleſs ſex forgotten: we have not only "Banducas and Zenobias, but Sapphos and Daciers, "Schurmans, Orindas, and Behns, who have hum"bled the moſt haughty of our antagoniſts, and "made them them do homage to our wit as well "as to our beauty. It is true, their miſchievous "and envious ſex have made it their utmoſt endea"vours to deal with us, as Hannibal was ſerved at "Capua, and to corrupt that virtue, which they can "no otherwiſe overcome, and ſometimes they pre"vailed. But if ſome Angels fell, others remained "in their innocence and perfection, if there were "not alſo ſome addition made to their happineſs "and glory by their continuing ſtedfaſt. Angels love, "but they love virtuouſly and reaſonably, and nei"ther err in the ſubject nor the manner. And if "all our Poeteſſes had done the ſame, I wonder "what our enemies could have found out to have "objected againſt us. However, here they are "ſilenced; and I dare be bold to ſay, that whoever "does not come extremely prejudiced to theſe poems, "will find in them that vivacity of thought, that "purity of language, that ſoftneſs and delicacy in "the love part, that ſtrength and majeſty of num"bers almoſt every where, eſpecially on heroical "ſubjects, and that clear and unaffected love to vir"tue; that height of piety and warmth of devo"tion in the Canticles and other religious pieces, "which they will hardly find exceeded in the beſt "Authors on theſe different kinds of writings, much "leſs equalled by any ſingle Writer. And now I "have nothing more, I think, lyes upon my hands, "but to aſſure the reader, that they were actually "writ by a young Lady, (all but ſome of the an"ſwers, as is well known to many perſons of qua"lity and worth) whoſe name had been prefixed, "had not her own modeſty abſolutely forbidden it. "The way of thinking and writing is all along the "ſame, only varying with the ſubject; and the "whole a mixture ſo very agreeable, that unleſs

Paſtoral on Love and Friendſhip, were not without all foundation in truth. She was the nameleſs Lady, to whom the following copy of verſes in the ſame Author is inſcribed. But Mr. Thomas Rowe, a very ingenious and learned Gentleman, of whom we ſhall give an account in the remark [E], was the perſon reſerved by Heaven to be the happy man, both to be made, and make happy. Being at Bath in the year 1709, Mr. Rowe was introduced into her company, who lived in a retirement not far diſtant from that city. The idea, he had conceived of her from report and her writings, charmed him; but when

" Philaret and myſelf, who have the honour to be " her friends, and who perſuaded her to publiſh " this ſpecimen, are very partial, it is more than " probable, they will meet with ſo favourable a re- " ception with the pious and ingenious reader, that " we may e're long prevail with her to oblige the " world with ſome others no way inferior to theſe."

The occaſion of Mrs. Singer's poetical name, Philomela, which from this time ſhe was known by to the world, and whether ſhe aſſumed it herſelf, or was complimented with it by her friends, is not known. The latter is moſt probable, and that it was given her at the publication of her poems, before which her modeſty not conſenting that her own name ſhould appear, this was ſubſtituted in the room of it, as bearing a very eaſy alluſion, and happily expreſſing the ſoftneſs and harmony of her verſes, not leſs ſoothing and melodious than the ſtrains of the nightingale when from ſome leafy ſhade ſhe fills the woods with her melancholly plaints (5).

(5) Life, p. 16.

[E] Mr. Thomas Rowe, a very ingenious and learned Gentleman, of whom we ſhall give an account in the remark.] He was born at London April the 25, 1687, the eldeſt ſon of the Reverend Mr. Benoni Rowe, who, with a very accurate judgment, and a conſiderable ſtock of uſeful learning, joined the talents of preaching, and a moſt lively and engaging manner in converſation. He was of a genteel deſcent, both on his father's and mother's ſide; being grandſon of William Rowe, Eſq; a Gentleman of worth and conſiderable eſtate, and Alice, a Lady of diſtinguiſhed ſenſe, beauty and virtue, daughter of Thomas Scot, Eſq; Member of Parliament for Aileſbury, in the county of Bucks; and by the maternal ſide, he was deſcended from the Rowes of Devon. But he thought too juſtly to value himſelf on ſuch extrinſick circumſtances. His ſuperior genius, and inſatiable thirſt after knowledge, were conſpicuous in his earlieſt years. He was able to read as ſoon almoſt as he could ſpeak; had ſuch a pleaſure in books, as to take none at all in the diverſions which children are ſo fond of; and when he was ſometimes prevailed on to make one in the recreations of his companions, his unreadineſs and inattention plainly ſhewed it was not out of choice he engaged, but purely from his good nature and complaiſance, to which he ſhould offer too much violence, always to deny their importunity. He commenced his acquaintance with the Claſſics at Epſom, while his father reſided there; and by his ſwift advances in this part of learning, quickly became the delight of his Maſter, a man very able in his profeſſion, and was treated by him with a very particular indulgence, in ſpite of the natural ruggedneſs and ſeverity of his temper. When his father removed to London, he accompanied him, and was placed under the famous Dr. Walker, Maſter of the Charter-houſe ſchool. His exerciſes here never failed of being diſtinguiſhed even among thoſe that had the approbation of that excellent Maſter, who would fain have perſuaded his father to ſend him to one of our Engliſh univerſities. But how honourably ſoever Mr. Rowe might think of the learning of thoſe noble ſeats of the Muſes, not having the ſame advantageous notion of the principles in credit there, he choſe to enter him in a private academy in London; and ſome time before his death, determined to ſend him to Leyden. Here he ſtudied Jewiſh Antiquities under Witſius, Civil-Law under Vitriarius, the Belles Lettres under Perizonius, and Experimental Philoſophy under Senguerdius; and eſtabliſhed a reputation for capacity, application, and an obliging deportment, both among the Profeſſors and Students. He returned from that celebrated mart of literature with a vaſt acceſſion of treaſure; in books he had purchaſed, and knowledge he had amaſſed; and intirely incorrupt in his morals, which he had preſerved as inviolate, as he could have done under the moſt vigilant eye and ſtricteſt hand, though left without any other reſtraints but thoſe of his own virtue and prudence.

The love of liberty had been always one of Mr. Rowe's moſt darling paſſions. He was very much confirmed therein by his familiar acquaintance with the Hiſtory and noble Authors of ancient Greece and Rome, whoſe very ſpirit was transfuſed into him; and reſiding ſo long in a Republick, where he had continual examples of the ineſtimable value of freedom, as the parent of induſtry, the nurſe of arts and ſciences, and univerſal ſource of ſocial happineſs. Tyranny of all ſorts he moſt ſincerely deteſted; but moſt of all eccleſiaſtical, in every ſhape, deeming the ſlavery of the mind as the moſt abject and ignominious, ſo in its conſequences more pernicious than any other.

His deſires after knowledge enlarged with his acquiſitions. All his morning hours, and a large part of the afternoon, were devoted to ſtudy, till the time of his being ſeized with the diſtemper of which he died. His library, in collecting which he was aſſiſted by his accurate knowledge of the beſt editions of books, conſiſted of a great number of the moſt valuable Authors, and amounted at his death to above five thouſand volumes. He was a perfect Maſter of the Greek, Latin, and French languages; and, which is ſeldom known to happen, had at once ſuch a prodigious ſtrength of memory, and inexhauſtible fund of wit, as would ſingly have been admired, and much more united. Theſe qualities, with an eaſy fluency of ſpeech, a frankneſs and benevolence of temper, a communicative diſpoſition, and a life and ſpirit, which nature muſt beſtow, ſince it can be but poorly imitated, made his company deſired by all who knew him. It was impoſſible there ſhould be a drowſy ſoul, where Mr. Rowe was preſent; he animated the converſation; every one was awake, and every one pleaſed. He had a penetration and quickneſs of thought hardly to be imagined, ſo as upon juſt glancing over an Author, to ſee to the bottom of his ſentiments. None of the politer kinds of learning were neglected by him. He was a good judge in Poetry, and had it in his power to have been himſelf an eminent Poet, for he had actually the moſt eſſential parts belonging to that character, the vivid fire, the rich vein, the copious diction. But as Poetry was not his predominant inclination, his genius had not all the poliſhing, which art and conſtant practice might have added to nature. Hiſtory was his favourite ſtudy, for which his vaſt memory and exquiſite judgment peculiarly qualified him.

He had formed a deſign to compile the lives of all the illuſtrious perſons in antiquity omitted by Plutarch; and for this purpoſe read the ancient Hiſtorians with great care. This deſign he in part executed. Eight lives were publiſhed ſince his deceaſe in 8vo, by way of ſupplement to that admired Biographer; in which, though ſo young a guide, he ſtrikes out a way like one well acquainted with the dark and intricate paths of antiquity. The ſtyle is perfectly eaſy; yet conciſe and nervous; the reflections juſt, and ſuch as might be expected from a lover of truth and mankind; and the facts intereſting in themſelves, or made ſo by the ſkill uſed in relating them. Beſides theſe lives, he had finiſhed and fitted for the preſs, the Life of Thraſybulus, which being put into the hands of Sir Richard Steele for his reviſal, was unhappily loſt, and could never ſince be recovered. The famous Mr. Dacier having tranſlated Plutarch's Lives into French, with remarks hiſtorical and when he had ſeen and converſed with her, he felt another kind of impreſſion, and the eſteem of her accompliſhments was heightened into the rapture of a lover [F]. He married her in the year 1710 [G]; and Mrs. Rowe's exalted merit and amiable qualities could not fail to inſpire the moſt generous and laſting paſſion. Mr. Rowe knew how to value that treaſure of wit, ſoftneſs, and virtue, which providence had favoured him with by putting her into his poſſeſſion; and made it his ſtudy to repay the felicity, with which ſhe crowned his life. The eſteem and tenderneſs he had for her is inexpreſſible, and poſſeſſion ſeemed ſcarce to have abated the fondneſs and admiration of the lover. It was ſome conſiderable time after his marriage, that he wrote to her a very tender Ode under the name of Delia, full of the warmeſt ſentiments of connubial friendſhip and affection [H]. As he had not a robuſt natural conſtitution, ſo an intenſe application to ſtudy beyond what the delicacy of his frame would bear, might perhaps contribute to that ill ſtate of health, which allayed the happineſs of his marriage-life, during the greater part of it. In the latter end of the year 1714, his weakneſs increaſed, and he appeared to labour under all the ſymptons of a conſumption. This fatal diſtemper, after it had confined him ſome months, put a period to his valuable life, at Hamſtead near London, May the 13th 1715, when he was but juſt paſt the twenty eighth year of his age. The exquiſite grief and affliction Mrs. Rowe felt for his loſs is not to be imagined. She wrote a beautiful elogy on his death [I]; and continued to the laſt moments of her life to expreſs the higheſt veneration and affection for his memory, and a particular regard and eſteem for his relations. It was only out of regard to Mr. Rowe, that with and critical, the Abbé Bellenger added in 1734, a ninth tome to the other eight, conſiſting of the Life of Hannibal, and Mr. Rowe's Lives made French by that learned Abbé; in the preface to which verſion he tranſcribes from the preface to the Engliſh edition on the character of the Author, with viſible approbation; and ſays, that the Lives were written with taſte, though being a poſthumous work, the Author had not put his laſt hand to it.

[F] The eſteem of her accompliſhments was heightened into the rapture of a lover.] During the courtſhip, he wrote a poetical epiſtle to a friend, who was a neighbour of Mrs. Singer, and intimate in the family; in which were the following lines:

Youth's livelieſt bloom, a never-fading grace,
And more than beauty ſparkles in her face.
How ſoon the willing heart her empire feels?
Each look, each air, each melting acting kills:
Yet the bright form creates no looſe deſires;
At once ſhe gives and purifies our fires,
And paſſions chaſte as her own ſoul inſpires.
Her ſoul, heav'n's nobleſt workmanſhip deſign'd,
To bleſs the ruin'd age, and ſuccour loſt mankind,
To prop abandon'd virtue's ſinking cauſe,
And ſnatch from vice its undeſerv'd applauſe.

[G] He married her in the year 1710.] On this occaſion Mr. John Ruſſel, a friend of Mr. Rowe, wrote the following epigram:

In nuptias Thomæ Rowe & Elizabethæ Singer.

Quid doctum par uſque tuum, ſocioſque labores
Favræ & Dacerii Gallia vana crepas?
Par majus gens Angla dedit, juvenem utque puellam, Quos hodie ſacro fœdere junxit amor.
Namque ea, quæ noſtri Phœbo cecinere docente,
Explicuiſſe tuis gloria ſumma foret.

Thus tranſlated by a young Gentleman.

No more, proud Gallia, bid the world revere
Thy learned pair, Le Fevre and Dacier:
Britain may boaſt this happy day unites
Two nobler minds in Hymen's ſacred rites:
What theſe have ſung, while all th' inſpiring Nine
Exalt the beauties of the verſe divine;
Thoſe (humble criticks of th' immortal ſtrain,)
Shall bound their fame to comment and explain.

[H] He wrote to her a very tender Ode under the name of Delia, full of the warmeſt ſentiments of connubial friendſhip and affection.] The following lines in it may appear remarkable, as it pleaſed heaven to diſpoſe events in a manner ſo agreeable to the wiſhes expreſſed in them.

So long may thy inſpiring page
And bright example bleſs the riſing age;
Long in thy charming priſon mayſt thou ſtay,
Late, very late aſcend the well-known way,
And add new glories to the realms of day!
At leaſt Heav'n will not ſure this pray'r deny;
Short be my life's uncertain date,
And earlier long than thine the deſtin'd hour of fate!
Whene'er it comes, mayſt thou be by,
Support my ſinking frame, and teach me how to die;
Baniſh deſponding nature's gloom,
Make me to hope a gentle doom,
And fix me all on joys to come.
With ſwimming eyes I'll gaze upon thy charms,
And claſp thee dying in my fainting arms;
Then gently leaning on thy breaſt,
Sink in ſoft ſlumbers to eternal reſt.
The gaſtly form ſhall have a pleaſing air,
And all things ſmile, while heav'n and thou art there.

[I] She wrote a beautiful Elegy on his death.] It is as follows.

In what ſoft language ſhall my thought get free,
My dear Alexis, when I talk of thee?
Ye Muſes, Graces, all ye gentle train
Of weeping loves, aſſiſt the penſive ſtrain!
But why ſhould I implore your moving art?
'Tis but to ſpeak the dictates of my heart;
And all that knew the charming youth will join
Their friendly ſighs and pious tears to mine;
For all that knew his merit muſt confeſs,
In grief for him, there can be no exceſs.
His ſoul was form'd to act each glorious part
Of life, unſtain'd with vanity or art.
No thought within his gen'rous mind had birth,
But what he might have own'd to heav'n and earth.
Practis'd by him each virtue grew more bright,
And ſhone with more than its own native light.
Whatever noble warmth could recommend
The juſt, the active, and the conſtant friend,
Was all his own——but, oh! a dearer name,
And ſofter ties my endleſs ſorrow claim.
Loſt in deſpair, diſtracted, and forlorn,
The lover and tender huſband mourn.
Whate'er to ſuch ſuperior worth was due,
Whate'er exceſs the fondeſt paſſion knew;
I felt for thee, dear youth; my joy, my care,
My pray'rs themſelves were thine, and only where Thou waſt concern'd, my virtue was ſincere.
Whene'er I begg'd for bleſſings on thy head,
Nothing was cold, or formal, that I ſaid;
My warmeſt vows to heav'n were made for thee,
And love ſtill mingled with my piety.

O thou

with his ſociety ſhe was willing to bear London during the winter-ſeaſon; and as ſoon after his deceaſe as her affairs would permit, ſhe indulged her unconquerable inclinations to ſolitude by retiring to Frome in Somerſetſhire, in the neighbourhood of which place the greateſt part of her eſtate lay. When ſhe forſook the town, ſhe determined to return to it no more, but to conceal the remainder of her life in an abſolute retirement; yet on ſome few occaſions ſhe thought it her duty to violate this reſolution. In compliance with the importunate requeſt of the Honourable Mrs. Thynne, ſhe paſſed ſome months with her at London, after the death of her daughter the Lady Brooke; and on the melancholly occaſion of the deceaſe of Mrs. Thynne herſelf, ſhe could not diſpute the commands of the Counteſs of Hartford, who earneſtly deſired her company, to ſoften the ſevere affliction of the loſs of ſo excellent a mother; and once or twice more the power, which this laſt Lady had over Mrs. Rowe, drew her by an obliging kind of violence to ſpend a few months with her at ſome of the Earl of Hartford's ſeats in the country. Yet even on theſe occaſions ſhe never quitted her retreat without very ſincere regret, and always returned to it, as ſoon as ever ſhe could, with decency, diſengage herſelf from the importunity of her noble friends (a). It was in this receſs, that ſhe compoſed the moſt celebrated of her works, Friendſhip in death [K], and the ſeveral parts of the Letters Moral and Entertaining [L]. In the year 1736, the importunity of ſome of Mrs. Rowe's acquaintance, who had ſeen the Hiſtory of Joſeph in manuſcript, prevailed on her (though not without real reluctance) to ſuffer it to be made publick. She wrote this piece in her younger years, and when firſt printed had carried it no farther than the marriage of the Hero of the Poem; but at the requeſt of her friends (particularly of an illuſtrious Lady (b), (to whom ſhe could ſcarce refuſe any thing) that the relation might include Joſeph's diſcovery of himſelf to his brethren, ſhe added two books, the compoſing of which is ſaid to have been no more than the labour of three or four days. This

(a) Life, p. 29, 34.

(b) The Counteſs of Hartford.

O thou waſt all my glory, all my pride!
Thro' life's uncertain paths my conſtant guide;
Regardleſs of the world, to gain thy praiſe,
Was all that could my juſt ambition raiſe.
Why has my heart this fond engagement known?
Or why has heav'n diſſolv'd the tie ſo ſoon?
Why was the charming youth ſo form'd to move?
Or why was all my ſoul ſo turn'd for love?
But virtue here a vain defence had made,
Where ſo much worth and eloquence could plead.
For he could talk——'twas extaſy to hear,
'Twas joy, 'twas harmony to ev'ry ear!
Eternal muſick dwelt upon his tongue,
Soft and tranſporting as the Muſes ſong.
Liſt'ning to him, my cares were charm'd to reſt,
And love, and ſilent rapture fill'd my breaſt:
Unheeded the gay moments took their flight,
And time was only meaſur'd by delight.
I hear the lov'd, the melting accents ſtill,
And ſtill the kind, the tender tranſport feel;
Again I ſee the ſprightly paſſions riſe;
And life and pleaſure ſparkle in his eyes.
My fancy paints him now with every grace,
But, ah! the dear deluſion mocks my fond embrace;
The ſmiling viſion takes its haſty flight;
And ſcenes of horror ſwim before my ſight.
Grief and deſpair in all their terrors riſe;
A dying lover pale and gaſping lies.
Each diſmal circumſtance appears in view;
The fatal object is for ever new.
His anguiſh with the quickeſt ſenſe I feel,
And hear this ſad, this moving language ſtill.
My deareſt wife! my laſt, my fondeſt care!
Sure Heaven for thee will hear a dying prayer.
Be thou the charge of ſacred Providence;
When I am gone, be that thy kind defence:
Ten thouſand ſmiling bleſſings crown thy head;
When I am cold, and number'd with the dead.
Think on thy vows, be to my mem'ry juſt;
My future fame and honour are thy truſt.
From all engagements here I now am free,
But that which keeps my ling'ring ſoul with thee.
How much I love, thy bleeding heart can tell,
Which does, like thine, the pangs of parting feel.
But haſte to meet me on theſe happy plains,
Where mighty love in endleſs triumph reigns.
He ceas'd; then gently yielded up his breath,
And fell a blooming ſacrifice to death.
But oh! what words, what numbers can expreſs,
What thought conceive the height of my diſtreſs?
Why did they tear me from thy breathleſs clay?
I ſhould have ſtaid, and wept my life away.
Yet, gentle ſhade, whether thou now doſt rove
Thro' ſome bleſt vale, or ever verdant grove,
One moment liſten to my grief, and take
The ſofteſt vows, that conſtant love can make.
For thee all thoughts of pleaſure I forego:
For thee my tears ſhall never ceaſe to flow:
For thee at once I from the world retire,
To feed in ſilent ſhades a hopeleſs fire.
My boſom all thy image ſhall retain;
The full impreſſion there ſhall ſtill remain.
As thou haſt taught my conſtant heart to prove
The nobleſt height and elegance of love;
That ſacred paſſion I to thee confine;
My ſpotleſs faith ſhall be for ever thine.

[K] Friendſhip in Death.] It was publiſhed at London 1728 in 8vo, under this title; Friendſhip in Death, in twenty Letters from the Dead to the Living. To which are added Thoughts on Death, tranſlated from the Moral Eſſays of the Meſſieurs du Port Royal. The Author of the Preface obſerves, that "the drift of "theſe letters is to impreſs the notion of the ſoul's "immortality; without which, all virtue and re"ligion, with their temporal and eternal good "conſequences, muſt fall to the ground. Some, who "pretend to have no ſcruples about the Being of a "God, have yet their doubts about their own eter"nal exiſtence, though valuable Authors abound in "Chriſtian and Moral proofs of it. But ſince no "means ſhould be left unattempted in a point of "ſuch importance, I hope endeavouring to make "the mind familiar with the thoughts of our future "exiſtence, and contract, as it were, unawares, an "habitual perſuaſion of it, by writings built on that "foundation, and addreſſed to the affections and "imagination, will not be thought improper, either "as a doctrine, or amuſement; amuſement, for "which the world makes by far the largeſt demand, "and which generally ſpeaking, is nothing but an "art of forgetting that immortality, the firm belief "and advantageous contemplation of which this "amuſement would recommend."

[L] The ſeveral parts of the Letters moral and entertaining.] The firſt part was printed in 1729 in 8vo, the ſecond in 1731, and the third in 1733. The deſign of theſe, as well as of Friendſhip in Death, is by fictitious examples of the moſt generous benevolence and heroic virtue, to allure the reader to the practice of every thing, that ennobles human nature, and

This additional part, which was her laſt work, was publiſhed but a few weeks before her death. This grand event, to prepare for which ſhe had made ſo much the buſineſs of her life, befel her according to her wiſh, in her beloved receſs. She was favoured with an uncommon ſtrength of conſtitution, and had paſſed a long ſeries of years with ſcarce any indiſpoſition ſevere enough to confine her in her bed. But about half a year before her deceaſe ſhe was attacked with a diſtemper, which ſeemed to herſelf, as well as others, attended with danger. Though this diſorder (as ſhe expreſſed herſelf to one of her moſt intimate friends) found her mind not quite ſo ſerene, and prepared to meet death as uſual; yet when, by devout contemplation on the atonement and mediation of our bleſſed Redeemer, ſhe had fortified herſelf againſt that fear and diffidence, from which the moſt exalted piety does not always ſecure in ſuch an aweful hour, ſhe experienced ſuch divine ſatisfaction and tranſport, that ſhe ſaid with tears of joy, ſhe knew not that ſhe had ever felt the like in all her life; and ſhe repeated, on this occaſion, Mr. Pope's verſes, entitled, The dying Chriſtian to his Soul, with an air of ſuch intenſe pleaſure, as evidenced that ſhe really felt all the elevated ſentiments of pious ecſtaſy and triumph, which breathe in that exquiſite piece of ſacred poetry. After this threatning illneſs, ſhe recovered her uſual good ſtate of health; and though at the time of her deceaſe ſhe was pretty far advanced in age, yet her exact temperance and the calmneſs of her mind, undiſturbed with uneaſy cares and paſſions, encouraged her friends to flatter themſelves with a much longer enjoyment of ſo valuable a life than it pleaſed Heaven to allow them. On the day, in which ſhe was ſeized with that diſtemper, which in a few hours proved mortal, ſhe ſeemed to thoſe about her to be in perfect health and vigour. In the evening of it, at about eight of the clock, ſhe converſed with a friend with all her wonted vivacity, and not without laughter; after which ſhe retired to her chamber. At about ten her ſervant hearing ſome noiſe in her miſtreſs's room, ran inſtantly into it, and found her fallen off the chair on the floor, ſpeechleſs, and in the agonies of death. She had the immediate aſſiſtance of a Phyſician and Surgeon; but all the means uſed were without ſucceſs, and after having given one groan, ſhe expired a few minutes before two of the clock on Sunday morning February the 20th 1736-7. Her diſeaſe was judged to be an apoplexy. A pious book was found lying open by her, as alſo ſome looſe papers, on which ſhe had written ſome devout ejaculations [M]. In her cabinet were found letters and benefits the world; and by juſt and lively images of the ſharp remorſe and real miſery, that attend the falſe and unworthy ſatisfaction of vice, to warn the young and unthinking from being ſeduced by the enchanting name of pleaſure, to inevitable ruin; the piety of which deſign is the more worthy of the higheſt panegyrics, as it is ſo uncommon. The greater part of the Poets of our country have apparently employed all their wit and art to diſguiſe the native deformity of vice, and ſtrew flowers on the paths to perdition. But this excellent Lady (as was obſerved of Mr. Cowley) poſſeſſed ſo much ſtrength and firmneſs of mind, and ſuch a perfect natural goodneſs, as could not be perverted by the largeneſs of her wit, and was proof againſt the art of poetry itſelf. The elegant Letters, which gave occaſion to remark this diſtinction in Mrs. Rowe's character as a polite Writer, are not only chaſte and innocent, but greatly ſubſervient to the intereſt of Heaven, and evidently deſigned, by repreſenting virtue in all her genuine beauty, to recommend her to the choice and admiration of mankind.

[M] Some looſe papers, in which ſhe had written ſome devout ejaculations.] They were as follow:

O guide, and counſel, and protect my ſoul from ſin!
O ſpeak, and let me know thy heavenly will.
Speak evidently to my liſtning ſoul!
O fill my ſoul with love, and light, and peace,
And whiſper heav'nly comfort to my ſoul!
O ſpeak celeſtial ſpirit, in the ſtrain
O love and heav'nly pleaſure to my ſoul!

Theſe papers contained a few more lines, but ſo ill written (occaſioned perhaps by the trembling of her hand at the approach of death) that it was not poſſible to make any conſiſtent ſenſe of them.

Thus it appeared, that in reading pious meditations, or forming devout ejaculations for the divine favour and aſſiſtance, Mrs. Rowe made the laſt uſe of the powers of reaſon below the ſkies. As ſhe was greatly apprehenſive, that the violence of pain, or languors of a ſick-bed might occaſion ſome depreſſion of ſpirits and melancholly fears unſuitable to the character and expectations of a Chriſtian, her manuſcript book of devotions contains frequent petitions to heaven, that ſhe might not in this manner diſhonour her profeſſion. And to her friends ſhe often expreſſed herſelf deſirous of a ſudden removal to the ſkies, as it muſt neceſſarily prevent any ſuch indecent behaviour in her laſt moments. So that the ſuddenneſs of her death may be interpreted as a reward of her ſingular piety, and a mark of the divine favour in anſwer to her prayers. Indeed (to borrow Mr. Henry Grove's expreſſions in a letter wrote to a friend ſoon after this Lady's deceaſe) though her death be univerſally lamented, yet the manner of it is rather to be eſteemed a part of her happineſs. One moment to enjoy this life; the next, or after a pauſe we are not ſenſible of, to find ourſelves got beyond not only the fears of death, but death itſelf, in poſſeſſion of everlaſting life, and health, and pleaſure: this moment to be devoutly addreſſing ourſelves to God, or employed in delightful meditations on his perfections; the next in his preſence, and ſurrounded with ſcenes of bliſs perfectly new, and unſpeakably joyous; is a way of departing out of life to be deſired, not dreaded by ourſelves, and felicitated, not condoled by our ſurviving friends. When all things are in a readineſs for our removal out of the world, it is a privilege to be ſpared the ſad ceremony of parting, and all the pains and ſtruggles of feeble nature.

She ſeemed by the gaiety and chearfulneſs of her temper, to be peculiarly fitted to enjoy life and all its innocent ſatisfactions; yet inſtead of any exceſſive fondneſs for things preſent and viſible, her contempt for what ſhe uſed to term a low eſtate of exiſtence, and a dull round of inſipid pleaſures, and the ardor with which ſhe breathed after the divine enjoyments of a future world, were inconceivably great. When her acquaintance expreſſed to her the joy they felt at ſeeing her look ſo well, and poſſeſſed of ſo much health as promiſed many years to come, ſhe was wont to reply, That it was the ſame as telling a ſlave, his fetters were like to be laſting; or complimenting him on the ſtrength of the walls of his dungeon. And the fervour of her wiſhes to commence the life of Angels irreſiſtibly broke from her lips in numberleſs other inſtances. This ſatiety of all things beneath the ſkies, and impatience after the perfect fruition of God, might perhaps be the occaſion, that in ſeveral periods of her life ſhe had flattered herſelf, that ſhe was near that bleſſed ſtate, on which ſhe had fixed letters to ſeveral of her friends, which ſhe had ordered to be delivered to the perſons, to whom they were directed, immediately after her deceaſe (i) [N]; ſince which, likewiſe, agreeably to her requeſt, the Reverend Dr. Iſaac Watts has reviſed and publiſhed her devotions under the title of Devout Exerciſes of the Heart, &c. [O]. We ſhall give her character all her hopes. And in particular, a little time before her death, ſhe expreſſed to ſeveral of her friends her firm perſuaſion, that her continuance on earth would be very ſhort, but without aſſigning any peculiar reaſon for this opinion (6).

(i) Life, p. 35—38.

(6) Life, p. 38, 39, 40.

[N] In her cabinet were found letters to ſeveral of her friends, which ſhe had ordered to be delivered to the perſons, to whom they were directed, immediately after her deceaſe.] That to the Right Honourable the Counteſs of Hartford was as follows.

" Madam,

" This is the laſt letter you will ever receive from " me; the laſt aſſurance I ſhall give you on earth " of a ſincere and ſtedfaſt friendſhip. But when we " meet again, I hope it will be in the heights of " immortal love and exſtaſy. Mine perhaps may " be the firſt glad ſpirit to congratulate your ſafe " arrival on the happy ſhores. Heaven can witneſs " how ſincere my concern for your happineſs is. " Thither I have ſent my ardent wiſhes, that you " may be ſecured from the flattering deluſions of the " world; and after your pious example has been " long a bleſſing to mankind, may you calmly re- " ſign your breath, and enter the confines of unmo- " leſted joy.

" I am now taking my farewel of you here; but it " is a ſhort adieu, for I die with full perſuaſion, " that we ſhall ſoon meet again: but oh! in what " elevation of happineſs? in what enlargement of " mind, and perfection of every faculty? What " tranſporting reflections ſhall we make on the ad- " vantages, of which we ſhall find ourſelves eter- " nally poſſeſſed? To him that loved, and waſhed " us in his blood, we ſhall aſcribe immortal glory, " dominion, and praiſe for ever.

" This is all my ſalvation and all my hope! " That name, in whom the Gentiles truſt, in whom " all the families on earth are bleſſed, is now my glo- " rious, my unfailing confidence; in his merits alone " I expect to ſtand juſtified before infinite purity and " juſtice. How poor were my hopes, if I depended " on thoſe works, which my own vanity, or the par- " tiality of men, have called good; and which, exa- " mined by divine purity, would prove perhaps but " ſpecious ſins! The beſt actions of my life would be " found defective, if brought to the teſt of that un- " blemiſhed holineſs, in whoſe ſight the heavens are " not clean. Where were my hopes but for a Re- " deemer's merits and atonement! how deſperate, " how undone my condition! With the utmoſt ad- " vantages I can boaſt, I ſhould ſtart back and trem- " ble at the thoughts of appearing before the un- " blemiſhed Majeſty. O Jeſus, what harmony dwells " in thy name! Celeſtial joy and immortal life is in " the ſound! Let Angels ſet thee to their golden " harps! Let the ranſomed nations for ever magnify " thee!

" What a dream is mortal life! what ſhadows are " the objects of ſenſe? All the glories of morta- " lity, my much-loved friend, will be nothing in " your view at the awful hour of death; when you " muſt be ſeparated from the whole creation, and en- " ter on the borders of the immaterial world.

" Something perſuades me this will be my laſt " farewel in this world: heaven forbid that it ſhould " be an everlaſting parting! May that divine pro- " tection, whoſe care I implore, keep you ſtedfaſt " in the faith of Chriſtianity, and guide your ſteps " in the ſtricteſt paths of virtue!

" Adieu, my moſt dear friend, till we meet in " the Paradiſe of God.

" Eliz. Rowe."

We ſhall add another to the Earl of Orrery.

" My Lord,

" There ſeems to be ſomething preſaging in the " meſſage you ordered me to deliver to your charm- " ing Henrietta, when I met her gentle ſpirit in the " bliſsful regions, which I believe will be very ſoon. " I am now acting the laſt part of life, and compoſing " myſelf to meet the univerſal terror with a for- " titude becoming the principles of Chriſtianity. It " is only through the great Redeemer's merits " and atonement, that I hope to paſs undaunted " through the fatal darkneſs:

" Before him death, the griſly tyrant, flies;
" He wipes the tears for ever from our eyes.

" All human greatneſs makes no figure to my pre- " ſent apprehenſion; every diſtinction vaniſhes, but " thoſe of virtue and real merit. It is this which " gives a peculiar regard for ſuch a character as " yours, and gives me hopes your example will not " fall ſhort of thoſe of your illuſtrious anceſtors. The " approaches of death ſet the world in a true light; " its brighteſt advantages appear no more than a " dream, in that ſolemn period. The immortal mind " perhaps will quit a cottage with leſs regret than it " would leave the ſplendor of a palace; and the " breathleſs duſt ſleep as quietly beneath the graſſy " turf, as under the parade of a coſtly monument. " Theſe are inſignificant circumſtances to a ſpirit " doomed to an endleſs duration of miſery or bliſs. " It is this important concern, my Lord, that has " induced me to ſpend my time in a peaceful retire- " ment; rather than to waſte it in a train of thought- " leſs amuſements. My thoughts are grown famili- " ar with the ſolemnity of dying, and death ſeems " to advance, not as an inflexible tyrant, but as the " peaceful Meſſenger of liberty and happineſs. May " I make my exit in that elate manner, thoſe charm- " ing lines of Mr. Pope deſcribe.

" The world recedes, it diſappears;
" Heav'n opens on my eyes, my ears
" With ſounds ſeraphic ring:
" Lend, lend your wings! I mount! I fly!
" O Grave, where is thy victory?
" O Death, where is thy ſting?

" The nearer I am approaching to immortality, the " more extenſive and enlarged I find the principles " of amity and good-will in my ſoul. From hence " ariſe the moſt ſincere wiſhes for your happineſs, " and of the charming pledges your lovely Henrietta " left. Oh! my Lord, if you would diſcharge the " ſacred truſt, keep them under your own inſpec- " tion.

" This will not reach you, my Lord, till I am paſt " the ceremony of ſubſcribing,

" Your humble ſervant,

" Eliz. Rowe."

[O] The Reverend Dr. Iſaac Watts has reviſed and publiſhed her devotions under the title of Devout Exerciſes of the Heart, &c.] The whole title is as follows: Devout Exerciſes of the Heart in Meditation and Soliloquy, Prayer, and Praiſe. By the late pious and ingenious Mrs. Rowe. Reviewed and publiſhed at her Requeſt by I. Watts, D. D. The firſt edition was publiſhed in 1737, and the ſecond in 1739. Dr. Watts, in the Preface (7) tells us, that theſe Devout Exerciſes are animated with ſuch fire, as ſeems to ſpeak the language of holy paſſion, and diſcovers them to be the dictates of her heart; and thoſe, who were favoured with her chief intimacy, will moſt readily believe it. The ſtyle, I confeſs, is raiſed above that of common meditation or ſoliloquy; but let it be remembered ſhe was no common Chriſtian. As her virtues were ſublime, ſo her genius was bright and ſparkling, and the vivacity of her imagination had a tincture of the muſe almoſt from her childhood.

(7) p. 11, & ſeq.

character in the remark [P]. She was favoured with the eſteem and acquaintance of the Counteſs of Winchelſea, the Viſcounteſs Weymouth, the Viſcounteſs Scudamore, the Lady Carteret, the Lady Brooke, the Honourable Mrs. Thynne, the Earl of Orrery, Dr.

childhood. This made it natural to her to expreſs the inward ſentiments of her ſoul in more exalted language, and to paint her own ideas in metaphor and rapture near a-kin to the diction of poeſy. The Reader will here find a ſpirit dwelling in fleſh, elevated into divine tranſports, congenial to thoſe of Angels, and unbodied minds. Her intenſe love to her God kindles at every hint, and tranſcends the limits of mortality. I ſcarce ever met with any devotional writings which give us an example of a ſoul, at ſpecial ſeaſons, ſo far raiſed above every thing that is not immortal and divine. . . . Let it be obſerved, that it was much the faſhion, even among ſome Divines of eminence in former years, to expreſs the fervours of the devout love to our Saviour in the ſtyle of the Song of Solomon. And I muſt confeſs, that ſeveral of my compoſures in verſe, written in younger life, were led by theſe examples unwarily into this track. But if I may be permitted to ſpeak the ſenſe of maturer age, I can hardly think this the happieſt language, in which Chriſtians ſhould generally diſcover their warm ſentiments of religion, ſince the clearer and more ſpiritual revelations of the New Teſtament. Yet ſtill it muſt be owned, there are ſome ſouls favoured with ſuch beatifying viſits from Heaven, and raptured with ſuch a flame of divine affection, as more powerfully engages all animal nature in their devotions, and conſtrains them to ſpeak their pureſt and moſt ſpiritual exerciſes in ſuch pathetick and tender expreſſions, as may be perverſely profaned by an unholy conſtruction. And the biaſs and propenſity towards this ſtyle is yet ſtronger, where early impreſſions of piety have been made on the heart by devout writings of this kind. It ſhould be remembered alſo, there is nothing to be found here, which riſes above our ideas; here are none of thoſe abſurd and incomprehenſible phraſes, which amuſe the ear with ſounding vanity, and hold reaſon in ſovereign contempt. Here are no viſionary ſcenes of wild extravagance, no affectations of the tumid and unmeaning ſtyle, which ſpreads a glaring confuſion over the underſtanding; nothing that leads the Reader into the region of thoſe myſtical ſhadows and darkneſs, which abound in the Romiſh Writers, under the pretence of refined light and ſublime ecſtaſy.

[P] We ſhall give her character in the remark.] She was not a regular beauty, yet ſhe poſſeſſed a large meaſure of the charms of her ſex. She was of a moderate ſtature, her hair of a fine colour, and her eyes of a darkiſh gray inclining to blue, and full of fire. Her complexion was very fair, and a natural roſy bluſh glowed in her cheeks. She ſpoke gracefully, and her voice was exceeding ſweet and harmonious, perfectly ſuited to that gentle language, which always flowed from her lips. But the ſoftneſs and benevolence of her aſpect was beyond all deſcription; it inſpired irreſiſtible love, yet not without ſome mixture of that awe and veneration, which diſtinguiſhed ſenſe and virtue, apparent in her countenance, are wont to create (8).

(8) Life, p. 55.

Her acquaintance with the great had taught her all the accompliſhments of good breeding, and complacency of behaviour; and without formality and affectation, ſhe practiſed in a diſtant ſolitude all the addreſs and politeneſs of a court; but ſhe learned no more than the real elegancies of grandeur. She ſeemed to have perfectly ſubdued the love of the vain ſhew of life. She juſtly deſpiſed the arts of dreſs and ornament, and endeavoured to infuſe the ſame contempt of them into all her acquaintance; yet without falling into the other extreme of indecent negligence (9).

(9) Ibid. p. 55, 56.

The love of ſolitude, which ſeems almoſt inſeparable from a poetick genius, diſcovered itſelf very early in her, and never forſook her but with life itſelf. However, ſhe did not recommend this conduct to others; for ſhe thus expreſſes her ſentiments on this ſubject in a letter to a friend, which ſhe wrote about three weeks before her death. It is an injury to mankind, to wiſh you had been born to a life of repoſe and leiſure. There are too few examples of generoſity and juſtice in the world, to wiſh any perſon of good character concealed. There are indeed a ſet of inſignificant and profligate mortals, who, if they ſhould take it into their heads to elope from mankind, and run wild in the woods, the publick would be ſo far from being detrimented, that they would be highly obliged by it; that ſo thoſe only, who are a grace to human nature, might appear in active and publick ſtations. "I do not, ſays ſhe in a "letter to another friend, affect any recluſe notions of "religion; my thoughts of that are juſt the reverſe, "and all eaſy and ſociable." Upon the whole, it may be ſaid with the greateſt truth, in defenſe of Mrs. Rowe's retreat, that ſhe did not fly to deſerts, that ſhe might wholly reſign herſelf to ſloth, and a monaſtick kind of devotion, unprofitable to the world; but amidſt the ſilence and quiet of ſolitude, ſhe employed no ſmall part of her time in actions of munificence and charity; or in compoſing thoſe works, with which ſhe has obliged the publick, which, as they inſpire the nobleſt ſentiments of benevolence and piety, may be of the moſt laſting and extenſive benefit to mankind (10).

(10) Life, p. 56, 57.

She had the happieſt command over her paſſions, and maintained a conſtant calmneſs of temper and ſweetneſs of diſpoſition, that could not be ruffled with adverſe accidents. It has been queſtioned whether ſhe was ever angry, eſpecially with regard to thoſe little misfortunes and diſpleaſing incidents, that commonly occur in life, and which, though really of a trivial nature, frequently prove too ſtrong temptations to indecencies of paſſion. She was only wont to turn theſe into ſubjects of mirth and agreeable raillery (11).

(11) Ibid. p. 58, 59.

She was in the utmoſt degree an enemy to ill-natured ſatyr and detraction. She was as unacquainted with envy, as if it had been impoſſible for ſo baſe a paſſion to enter into the human mind. She exceedingly loved to praiſe, and never failed to obſerve and applaud every appearance of merit in thoſe, with whom ſhe was acquainted; but over-looked all their failings with more than even the uſual partiality of friendſhip (12).

(12) Ibid. p. 59——61.

She had few equals in her excellent turn of converſation. Her wit was inexhauſtible, and ſhe expreſſed her thoughts in the moſt beautiful and flowing eloquence. It was hardly poſſible to be in her company without becoming wiſer and better, or to leave it without regret (13).

(13) Ibid. p. 62, 63.

Under the ſtrongeſt temptations to pride, ſhe retained all the humility of the meaneſt and moſt obſcure perſon of the human race. She was exquiſitely ſenſible of her own defects. She aſſumed no indecent ſhare in converſation, and was frequently ſilent on ſubjects ſhe well underſtood, and on which ſhe could have diſplayed her wit to great advantage. She never dictated to others, nor arrogated any reſpect or deference to her own ſentiments; but in converſing with perſons of parts and abilities far beneath her own, ſtudied to make the ſuperiority of her genius eaſy to them, by the moſt obliging goodneſs and condeſcenſion of behaviour. She infinitely loved and reverenced true goodneſs, and paid a peculiar reſpect to ſincere piety, when great degrees of ignorance, and extremely mean circumſtances, might have quite obſcured it to leſs humble and generous minds (14).

(14) Ibid. p. 63, 64.

She was perfectly untainted with that love of pleaſure, which has ſo univerſally corrupted the preſent age, and is juſtly thought to have the moſt unfriendly influence on the nobleſt kinds of virtue. The native grandeur of her ſoul preſerved her from a fondneſs for any kind of luxury, judging it much beneath the dignity of a Being poſſeſſed of reaſon, and born for immortality.

(15) Ibid. p. 64, 65.

She had a contempt of riches, that has been rarely equalled, and which may be regarded as the certain mark of a truly great mind. The love of money ſhe thought the moſt ſordid and ignoble of paſſions. She could ſcarce bare the mention of injuſtice without trembling; and the tenderneſs and delicacy of her conſcience with regard to this ſin was ſo great, that ſhe hardly thought ſhe could keep far enough from it (16).

(16) Ibid. p. 66, 67, 68.

Dr. Kenne, Lord Biſhop of Bath and Wells, Sir Richard Blackmore, Dr. Iſaac Watts, Mr. Prior, Mr. Grove, &c. But above all ſhe poſſeſſed the higheſt degree of friendſhip with another illuſtrious ornament of the age, which as it began as ſoon as ever her Ladyſhip was capable of this generous paſſion, ſo it continued without the leaſt interruption to the laſt moments of Mrs. Rowe's life; and there cannot be a more advantageous concluſion of the character of this excellent perſon, than to remark that her life was honoured with the friendſhip, and her death lamented with the tears of the Counteſs of HARTFORD. In the preſent year 1739, Mrs. Rowe's Miſcellaneous Works were publiſhed

Her indifference to fame was no leſs remarkable. As ſhe ſeemed to ſhun it by concealing herſelf during almoſt the whole of her life in an obſcure ſolitude, ſo ſhe practiſed no arts to promote her reputation (17).

(17) Life, p. 69.

She was exemplary for every relative duty, filial piety was a remarkable part of her character. She loved the beſt of fathers as ſhe ought, and repaid his uncommon care and tenderneſs by all juſt returns of duty and affection. She has been heard to ſay, That ſhe could die rather than diſpleaſe him; and the anguiſh ſhe felt at ſeeing him in pain in his laſt ſickneſs was ſo great, that it occaſioned ſome kind of convulſion, a diſorder, from which ſhe was wholly free in every other part of her life.

When ſhe was entered into a marriage ſtate, the higheſt eſteem and moſt tender affection appeared in all her conduct to Mr. Rowe; and by the moſt gentle and obliging manners, and the exerciſe of every ſocial and good-natured virtue, ſhe confirmed the empire ſhe had gained over his heart. She complied with his inclinations in ſeveral inſtances, to which ſhe was naturally averſe, and made it her ſtudy to ſoften the anxieties, and heighten all the ſatisfactions of his life. Her capacity for ſuperior things did not tempt her to neglect the leſs honourable cares, which the laws of decency impoſe on the ſofter ſex in the connubial relation; much leſs was ſhe led by a ſenſe of her own merit to aſſume any thing to herſelf inconſiſtent with that duty and ſubmiſſion, which the precepts of Chriſtian piety ſo ſtrictly enjoin. Mr. Rowe had ſome mixture of natural warmth in his temper, of which he had not always a perfect command. If at any time this broke out into ſome little exceſſes of anger, it never awaked any paſſion of the like kind in Mrs. Rowe; but on the contrary ſhe always remained miſtreſs of herſelf, and ſtudied by the gentleſt language and moſt ſoothing endearments to reſtore Mr. Rowe's mind to that calmneſs, which reaſon approves. And ſhe equally endeavoured in every other inſtance by the ſofteſt arts of perſuaſion, and in a manner remote from all airs of ſuperiority, to lead Mr. Rowe on towards that perfection of virtue, to which ſhe herſelf aſpired with the trueſt Chriſtian zeal. During his long illneſs, ſhe ſcarce ever ſtirred from him a moment, and alleviated his ſevere affliction by performing with inconceivable tenderneſs and aſſiduity all the offices of compaſſion ſuited to that melancholly occaſion. She partook his ſleepleſs nights, and never quitted his bed, unleſs to ſerve him, or watch by him. And as ſhe could ſcarce be perſuaded to forſake even his breathleſs clay, ſo ſhe conſecrated her future years to his memory, by honouring his aſhes with a reſolution of perpetual widowhood, which ſhe inviolably maintained. Her conduct in this laſt inſtance, on the review of it after an interval of ſeveral years, afforded her great ſatisfaction; for ſhe thus expreſſes herſelf in a letter intended, after her own deceaſe, to be delivered to Mrs. Marrow, if that Lady had ſurvived her. Whatever ſuch diſtinguiſhed ſenſe and merit could claim, I have endeavoured to pay my much-loved huſband's memory. I reflect with pleaſure on my conduct on this occaſion, not only from a principle of juſtice and gratitude to him, but from a conſcious ſenſe of honour and love of a virtuous reputation after death . . . But if the ſoul in a ſeparate ſtate ſhould be inſenſible of human cenſure or applauſe, yet there is a diſintereſted homage due to the ſacred name of virtue. She mourned over the death of her huſband and father with all that becoming tenderneſs and ſenſibility, which ought to touch every humane and generous heart at the loſs of the deareſt perſons on earth; yet her ſubmiſſion to the will of heaven was without the leaſt murmur, and altogether ſuitable to that eminent piety, which appeared in every other part of her life.

She was a gentle and kind miſtreſs, treating her ſervants with great condeſcenſion and goodneſs.

She was a warm and generous friend; juſt, if not partial, to the merit of thoſe, whom ſhe loved, and moſt gentle and candid to their errors.

She had a moſt god-like diſpoſition. The exerciſe of charity was half the pleaſure, we may add, the buſineſs of her life. Nor was this only the peculiar ſoftneſs of her ſex, or a natural felicity of temper, but the moſt virtuous deſire to diffuſe happineſs. Her zeal to do generous actions is inexpreſſible; it broke out on all occaſions. Her charities were ſo great (if we conſider the mediocrity of her fortune) that they can ſcarce be parallel'd (18).

(18) Ibid. p. 69——77.

She practiſed ſecret prayer three times a day; and had an inexpreſſible love and veneration for the holy Scriptures, and was aſſiduous in the reading of them, particularly the New Teſtament, the Pſalms, and thoſe parts of the prophetical writings, which relate to our Bleſſed Saviour. The fervour of her zeal in the cauſe of religion was beyond the rate of common examples. As ſhe could not command tears of tranſport, when ſhe was witneſs to any eminent inſtances of piety, ſo on the other hand, the fatal advances of infidelity in this nation rent her very ſoul.

She ſpoke with the higheſt eſteem and gratitude of thoſe excellent perſons, who in the preſent age have defended Chriſtianity by their learned writings, and truly venerated them as publick benefactors to mankind (19).

(19) Ibid. p. 90, 91, 92, 93.

She ſeemed born for the practice of ſublime and aſcetic piety; it was the ſupreme pleaſure of her life; yet ſhe did not ſet too high a value on ſtrong emotions of the paſſions and religious fervours, nor was tempted by the love of devotion to prefer it to ſocial virtue. For ſhe thus expreſſes herſelf in a letter to a noble friend. I have wrote no pious meditations of late. The warmth of devotion, perhaps, as well as other paſſions, declines with life. But I hope the calm, the reaſonable, and ſolid part of religion will ſtill be improved. And in another letter to the ſame Lady ſhe ſays, I have no reſtitution to make, nor the leaſt known injury to repair. I lay a much greater ſtreſs on this part of religion that regards mankind, than I do on any height of devotion, as neceſſary, I think, to reconcile the mind to death. She poſſeſſed a large meaſure of that ſerenity and chearfulneſs of temper, which ſeem naturally to flow from conſcious virtue, and the hopes of the divine favour (20).

(20) Ibid. p. 94, 95.

" Her love of piety was not confined to thoſe of " her own party in religion; and it ought to be re- " lated as an exemplary inſtance of Chriſtian mode- " ration, that ſhe continued all the latter part of her " life in conſtant communion with ſome, who differ- " ed from her in articles, which ſhe thought of great " importance; though ſhe was frequently ſolicited to " an oppoſite conduct by perſons of a narrow ſpirit, " and could not eſcape cenſure for her adherence to " the charity of the Goſpel. And as her zeal did " in no part of her life degenerate into religious " fury, ſo towards the cloſe of it, her gentle and " charitable diſpoſitions increaſed, and ſhe ſeemed " to be viſibly ripening into the temper of that " bleſſed Region, to which ſhe was ſoon to be re- " moved (21)." And here we ſhall relate an incident, which happened while Mrs. Rowe was at the ſeat of the Lady Worſeley, daughter of the Lord Viſcount Weymouth, and aunt to the Counteſs of Hartford, in Hampſhire, where ſhe ſpent eight months. She had, upon liſhed at London in two volumes in 8vo [Q].

(21) Ibid. p. 96.

upon a mature conſideration of the point, reſolved to receive the communion according to the rites of the Church of England; but upon hearing, on the day, wherein the ſacrament was to be adminiſtred, a ſermon from the Miniſter of the pariſh, full of exceſſive rancour, againſt all who diſſent from the eſtabliſhed church, ſhe was ſo offended at it, that ſhe thought neither herſelf nor the Preacher were then in a proper diſpoſition to partake of an inſtitution, which is the bond of Chriſtian charity.

[Q] In the preſent year 1739, Mrs. Rowe's Miſcellaneous Works were publiſhed at London in two volumes in 8vo.] The title is as follows: The Miſcellaneous Works in proſe and verſe of Mrs. Elizabeth Rowe. The greater part now firſt publiſhed by her order from her original manuſcripts, by Mr. Theophilus Rowe. To which are added, Poems on ſeveral occaſions, by Mr. Thomas Rowe. And to the whole is prefixed, an account of the Lives and Writings of the Authors. To the firſt volume are prefixed ſeveral poems to Mrs. Rowe, or upon her death; two of which we ſhall inſert here, as being written by perſons of her own ſex, the former a Lady of great diſtinction for quality and merit, and the latter a young Lady of uncommon genius and ſkill in the ancient and modern languages, to whom we are obliged for an excellent * tranſlation from the Italian of Signior Algarotti's Il Newtonianiſmo per le Dame, publiſhed in the preſent year 1739, at London, in two volumes in 12mo, under the title of Sir Iſaac Newton's Philoſophy explained, for the Uſe of the Ladies. In ſix Dialogues on Light and Colours. The poems are as follow.

* See the Hiſt. of the Works of the Learned, for June 1739. Art. 31.

Verſes to the Memory of Mrs. ROWE. By a Friend.

While penſive in the lonely ſhade I ſtray,
Or thro' enamel'd meads purſue my way,
A gloomy ſorrow hangs about my heart,
And ſudden tears o'er my dim eye-balls ſtart.
In vain (I cry) in vain, delightful ſpring,
Thou deck'ſt the plains, who now thy charms ſhall ſing?
Who from the radiant beauty of the fields,
And ev'ry herb thy genial influence yields,
Shall teach us their great Author to diſcern,
And from each tree and flow'r his goodneſs learn?
Since PHILOMELA her laſt debt has paid,
And cold and ſilent in the tomb is laid.
No more the echoes ſhall repeat her ſong,
Nor cryſtal Riv'lets, as they glide along,
Shall on their waters bear her tuneful lays,
Devoted all to her Redeemer's praiſe.
No more ſhall I her friendly converſe ſhare,
Nor hear the dictates of her pious care.
Yet tho' the bright example is remov'd,
Be its idea ſtill rever'd and lov'd:
To imitate her virtues may I try,
And on the path ſhe mark'd ſtill fix my eye.
Tho' far behind, imperfect, and diſtreſt,
Fain would I ſeek the climes of balmy reſt;
Where ſin no more can tempt, nor pain annoy,
Nor pining ſorrow interrupt their joy;
Where rivers of eternal pleaſure flow,
And gales of peace for ever round them blow.
Say, could I ſee her in this happy ſtate,
And that ſhe lives no more on earth, regret?
That freed, and victor in the glorious ſtrife,
No more ſhe labours thro' the toil of life,
But wears the ſtarry crown, the bright reward,
By God himſelf for all his ſaints prepar'd?
How often, when I join'd her ev'ning walk,
Would ſhe in rapture of this period talk!
How oft the fetters of her clay bemoan,
And wiſh them broke, impatient to be gone!
Yet ſtill reſign'd to wait th' appointed day,
Nor dar'd to murmur at her fate's delay.
The thought of earthly bliſs ſhe long had fled,
Deſirous to be number'd with the dead,
And meet her dear Alexis on that ſhore,
Where fear of parting can torment no more.
Faithful to him ſhe from the world retir'd,
Tho' by that world diſtinguiſh'd and admir'd.
In ſolitude ſhe paſt the circling days,
Fearleſs of cenſure, negligent of praiſe.
In contemplation all her hours were ſpent,
Her thoughts on heav'nly objects ever bent;
Till by the hand of death from hence remov'd,
Whoſe dart ſhe met in the retreat ſhe lov'd.
Obſcure and peaceful may her aſhes lye,
No marble pomp attract the curious eye;
Nor weeping Angel ſhall her grave adorn,
And teach the careleſs paſſenger to mourn;
No ſun-burnt pilgrim from afar ſhall come,
With ſuperſtitious rites to hail her tomb;
Nor ſhining tapers thro' the gloom of night
Upon her urn diffuſe a trembling light.
Her worth a far more laſting fume ſhall give,
Her worth in ev'ry virtuous breaſt ſhall live.

On the Death of Mrs. ROWE.

Accept, illuſtrious ſhade! theſe artleſs lays,
The Muſe a tribute to thy mem'ry pays:
Thy loſs to no one private grief confin'd,
Demands the gen'ral ſorrow of mankind.
Oft did intrigue its guilty arts unite
To blacken the records of female wit;
To tuneful ſong loſt ev'ry modeſt grace,
And lawleſs freedoms triumph'd in their place.
The Muſe, for vices not her own accus'd,
With bluſhes view'd her ſacred gifts abus'd;
Thoſe gifts for nobler purpoſes deſign'd,
To raiſe the thoughts, and moralize the mind,
The chaſte delights of virtue to inſpire,
And warm the boſom with ſeraphick fire,
Sublime the paſſions, lend devotion wings,
And celebrate the firſt great cauſe of things.
Theſe glorious taſks were PHILOMELA's part,
Who charms the fancy, and who mends the heart.
In her was ev'ry bright perfection join'd,
Whate'er adorns or dignifies the mind;
Her's ev'ry happy elegance of thought,
Refin'd by virtue, as by genius wrought.
Each low-born care her pow'rful ſtrains controul,
And wake the nobler paſſions of the ſoul.
When to the vocal grove, or winding ſtream,
She hymn'd th' almighty Author of its frame,
Tranſported ecchos bore the ſounds along,
And all creation liſten'd to the ſong;
Bold as when raptur'd Seraphs ſtrike the lyre,
Chaſte as the Veſtal's conſecrated fire,
Soft as the balmy airs, that gently play
In the calm ſun-ſet of a vernal day,
Sublime as virtue, elegant as wit,
As fancy various, and as beauty ſweet.
Applauding Angels with attention hung,
To learn the heav'nly accents from her tongue:
They in the midnight hour beheld her riſe
Beyond the verge of theſe inferior ſkies;
Where wrapt in joys to vulgar minds unknown,
She felt a flame ecſtatic as their own.
Oh! while diſtinguiſh'd in the realms above,
The bliſsful ſeats of harmony and love,
Thy happy ſpirit joins the heav'nly throng,
Glows with their tranſports, and partakes their ſong,
Fix'd on my ſoul, ſhall thy example grow,
And be my genius and my guide below:
To this I'll point my firſt, my nobleſt views;
Thy ſpotleſs verſe ſhall regulate my muſe.
And oh! forgive (tho' faint the tranſcript be,
That copies an original like thee).
My higheſt pride, my beſt attempt for fame,
That joins my own to PHILOMELA's name.

ELIZABETH CARTER.

T.

ROY (JAMES LE), Baron of the Holy Empire, and Lord of St. Lambert, deſcended from an ancient and noble family which came originally from France [A], acquired great reputation reputation by the works publiſhed by him. He was a native of Antwerp, where he was born the 28th of October 1633. As ſoon as he was of an age fit for travelling, Baron le Roy (a) his father ſent him to the moſt famous Univerſities of Europe; and at his return, made over to him his employments at the Court of Bruſſels, which he had filled with honour. Our Baron alſo diſcharged the duties of thoſe employments ſo well, that Marquis de Caracene, Governor of the Netherlands, ſent him to Spain, to inform Philip IV. his Catholick Majeſty, of the ſtate of his Government. After having performed his Commiſſion in a laudable manner, he returned to the Low Countries, but could not agree with the Marquis de Caſtel Rodrigo, then Governor of them; which made him reſolve to give up his employments, and accordingly he retired to an eſtate poſſeſſed by him near Antwerp. Had it not been for this, he would have raiſed himſelf to the moſt conſiderable employments, but this would have been a loſs to the Commonwealth of Learning, ſince he then could not have enjoyed ſo much leiſure, which he employed ſo well in compoſing books that have been publiſhed [B]. See the remark [B].

[A] Deſcended from an ancient and noble family, that came originally from France.] The anceſtors of Baron le Roy, left France to follow Philip le Bon, the Duke of Burgundy, and ſettled in Flanders.

(a) PHILIP LE ROY, Lord of Revels Broughem, and of St. Lambert in Brabant. See the rem. [A].

The Readers will there meet with ſome particulars relating to Mrs. Bourignon, and which gave offence to her Partizans. I ſhall examine what one of them ſays in anſwer to my remark [C].

RUA

PHILIP LE ROY, Knight-Banneret, Lord of Brouchem, &c. father of him who is the ſubject of this article, bought of Dame Margaret Baudewyns, the Lordſhip of Chapelle St. Lambert, the 15th of December 1654 (1). He was created free Baron of the holy empire, by the letters patents of the Emperor Leopold, dated at Laxemburg the 30th of May 1671 (2). He was then Counſellor to his Catholick Majeſty, in the ſupreme Council of the Finances of the Low-Countries and Burgundy.

(1) Topograph. Gallo-Brabantiæ, p. 185.

(2) The reader will find the ſubſtance of it, in p. 70, of the book the title of which I ſhall give hereunder, citat. 10.

[B] He compoſed books which have been publiſhed.] The firſt work he undertook after his being withdrawn from buſineſs was, Notitia Marchionatus ſacri Romani Imperii (3). It was printed at Amſterdam in folio, anno 1678. See Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (4). He afterwards publiſhed in the ſame city in 1683, a work entitled, Achates Tiberianus, ſive Gemma Cæſarea, antiquitate, argumento, arte, hiſtoria, prorſus incomparabilis, D. Auguſti apotheoſin, Imp. Cæſ. Tiberii, Auguſtæque Juliæ Domus ſeriem & iconas, genteſque bello captas repræſentans, notis hiſtoricis illuſtrata, in folio. See Acta eruditorum (5), and the Journal des Savans (6). He printed in 1693, at Amſterdam, a folio book entitled, Topographia Hiſtorica Gallo-Brabantiæ, qua Romanduæ oppida, municipia, & dominia illuſtrantur, atque monaſteria, Nobiliumque Prætoria, Caſtellaque in æs inciſa exhibentur. This work gives a very particular deſcription of that part of the Low-countries called Walloon Brabant; and had we ſuch a deſcription of all Europe, it would be a complete ſtorehouſe of entertainment and inſtruction. I add, that he has writ a commentary on the chronicle of Baldwinus de Avennis; and that he is now writing (7) that of the Monk Albericus Trium fontium, which has never been printed, and the publication whereof has been long deſired. He lately publiſhed (8) a ſmall book, conſiſting but of 13 pages, entitled, Prædictio Anthoniæ Bourignon de vaſtatione urbis Bruxellarum per ignem, in which, after a ſhort deſcription of the calamities which that city ſuffered, the 13th of Auguſt 1695, when bombarded by the French; he mentions what is related concerning Antoinette Bourignon, in the ſupplement to Moreri's dictionary; and the following paſſage from one of her letters: I don't find that I can make any ſtay at Bruſſels, though I ſhould have full liberty to do it; nor could I ſtay long in it, BECAUSE BRUSSELS MUST BE DESTROYED BY FIRE, if I have had a true viſion, as I told you at Mr. Maſuriel's (9). The ſpirit, that revealed this conflagration to Mrs. Bourignon, did not ſpecify the time well; ſhe imagining, in 1666, that the city of Bruſſels would be ſoon burnt; and yet it was not bombarded till twenty-nine years after.

(3) Antwerp is the capital of that Marquiſate, which is one of the ſeventeen provinces of the Low-countries.

(4) For Sept. 1685. art. 5. p. m. 1004.

(5) Acta eruditor. Lipſ. 1684. p. 255.

(6) Journ. des Savans, March 19, 1685.

(7) Ann. 1696.

(8) At Amſt. 1696.

(9) Theſe words are extracted from a letter written from Ghent to Mr. de Cort, the 15th of Jan. 1666. It is the 12th of the 3d part, of the book entitled, Tombeau de la fauſſe Theologie.

Since this article was firſt printed, Baron le Roi has publiſhed, Caſtella & Prætoria Nobilium Brabantiæ, Cœnobiaque celebriora ad vivum delineata ærique inciſa . . . . cum brevi eorumdem deſcriptione. At Antwerp in 1696, folio; and L'Erection de toutes les Terres, Seigneuries, & Familles tirées du Brabant, prouvée par des Extraits des Lettres Patentes tirées des Originaux (10). Such a work as this ſhould be publiſhed in every province of Europe; which would be the beſt method of diſcovering thoſe who ſo boldly uſurp the title of Marquis or Count.

(10) This book was printed at Leyden, by Peter Vander Aa, in 1699, folio.

[C] I ſhall examine what one of Mrs. Bourignon's partizans ſays in anſwer to my remark.] His anſwer is inſerted in a piece entitled, Lettre touchant les Auteurs Myſtiques, printed a year ſince (11), with La Theologie réelle vulgairement ditte la Theologie Germanique. The anonymous perſon who publiſhed this, quotes my words, and then ſays as follows (12): "No, by your leave, to lay aſide all equivocation, "no time was either exactly, or not exactly, fixed in "the prediction, as you would inſinuate; and be"ſides, it was not a verbal revelation, as you would "have it, in order to make it ſuſceptible of falſity "with regard to time; but it was viſual, and never"theleſs of ſuch a nature, as not to point out expreſsly "any time. Mrs. B. (Bourignon) did not ſuppoſe that "Bruſſels would be abſolutely burnt, ſooner or later: "but as nothing was determined on that point, no "time fixed, nor excluded, this indetermination was "directly the reaſon why ſhe did not look upon her"ſelf as ſecure from that danger at any time; and "why ſhe had reaſon to be upon her guard at all "times." He adds that it was in the ſame manner Chriſt and his Apoſtles having foretold, in general, his ſecond coming, exhorted the Chriſtians, of that age, to be watchful at all times, in order that they might not be ſurpriſed; on which occaſion ſome malicious and profane perſon might have much more pretence than our Author to ſay as he did: the ſpirit, who had revealed this ſecond coming to them, did not ſpecify well the time; they imagining ſeventeen hundred years ago, that this would happen in their life-time, and yet nothing of this has been ſeen yet. St. Peter informs us, that profane perſons uſed to criticiſe in that manner. In this manner the anonymous Writer has criticiſed my remark; but I will now ſhew how illuſory it is.

(11) At Amſt. by Henry Wetſtein, 1701, 12mo. See Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Nov. 1700. p. 555, & ſeq.

(12) Lettre touchant les Auteurs Myſtiques, p. 114.

I obſerved that the ſpirit did not ſpecify well the time, and this Author owns that it fixed no time. What can I deſire more? Is it not plain, that whoſoever omits to ſpecify the time does not ſpecify it either well or ill; and conſequently, it may be affirmed, that he has not ſpecified it well. My propoſition is therefore true; and it will be certain, at leaſt, that Mrs. Bourignon drew a falſe conſequence from what had been revealed to her viſually. She concluded from thence, that the city of Bruſſels would ſoon be deſtroyed by fire; for ſhe believed that the permiſſion granted her of reſiding there would ſerve her only for a little time; ſhe judged this, I ſay, becauſe of this viſual revelation mentioned to us. The reſolution ſhe herſelf took (to retire from a city which ſhe ſuppoſed would ſoon be burnt down,) ſhe doubtleſs would have adviſed all to follow, who would have ſubmitted to her direction; and conſequently ſhe would have adviſed all the inhabitants of Bruſſels to retire, had they been her diſciples. I now leave the Reader to judge how ſtrangely theſe people would have been deluded, had they complied with her advice? A vaſt number of perſons who were to live not above ten, twelve, fifteen or twenty years, would have abandoned their native country, to prevent their loſing their lives in a fire which was not to happen till twenty nine years after. They would have ſuffered

ſuffered themſelves to be guided by falſe prophecies: for a revelation, though true in itſelf, becauſe it exhibits only images, becomes falſe and deceitful the inſtant it is applied to times or places which do not ſuit to it. Though we take it for granted that the revealing ſpirit will not deceive; nevertheleſs, the perſon, to whom it communicates itſelf, will nevertheleſs deceive by falſe applications; and in this manner Mrs. Bourignon's advocate furniſhes us, without being aware of it, wherewith to conclude, that ſhe was a falſe Propheteſs in that reſpect. It were better not to be favoured with any revelations, than to receive ſuch prophecies as are not underſtood; and which are ſo badly explained, that perſons are thereby induced to engage in ſeveral unneceſſary meaſures, and to arm themſelves with groundleſs precautions. Had Mrs. Bourignon continued quiet in the city which ſhe imagined was threatened with fire, ſhe would have paſſed the reſt of her days without ſeeing the effects of her prophecy, ſhe dying fifteen years before Bruſſels was bombarded. She conſequently was ſeized with a needleſs terror, and a panic fear made her quit Bruſſels. I would not have it ſuppoſed, that I grant her advocate, that the revelation he ſpeaks of was evidently verified in the event (13). The bombarding of Bruſſels has no more connexion with the viſions of Mrs. Bourignon, than with the dreams of other people. I believe no one will deny, but that ſome perſon, one time or other, ſees, in their dreams, a city on fire. When a perſon dreams that a houſe is on fire, it is commonly his own houſe. If ſuch dream that a town is overflowed or conſumed by the flames, it is generally ſuch a city as they are beſt acquainted with, that of their birth, or which they live in. I therefore will not ſcruple to obſerve, and believe that ſuch as attend to their dreams, will not accuſe me of raſhneſs, that ſeveral citizens of Bruſſels imagined they ſaw, in ſleep, every corner of the city in flames, and that ſome fancied they even ſaw it bombarding (14). Now ought theſe to be conſidered as prophetical dreams? Such viſions, in the brain of devout people, may more juſtly be ſuſpected, than thoſe which come from the worldly-minded; for devout people imagine, when awake, that the wickedneſs and corruption, they ſee in great towns, will draw down fire from Heaven. Now perſons commonly ſee, in dreams, thoſe objects which they ſaw when awake (15). I omit obſerving, that according to Mrs. Bourignon's prophecy, Bruſſels was to be deſtroyed by fire. It is evident to every one, that this intimates a total deſtruction, conſequently this was not the bombarding in 1695: for this bombardment did not deſtroy that city, ſeveral houſes being only ruined or damaged by it. It was made much more beautiful and magnificent a very few years after; and the inhabitants valued ſo little the havock made by the bombs, that they declared publickly, when they ſpoke of the uneaſineſs which the news of the forwarding of the peace of Reſwick gave them, that they would rather be bombarded three or four times in that manner, than ſee an end put to a war which brought in ſuch vaſt ſums of money among them.

(13) Lettre touchant les Auteurs Myſtiques, p. 114.

(14) Eſpecially ſince the Newspapers mentioned ſo often cities that had been bombarded.

(15) See the art. LOTICHIUS (PETER) rem. [G].

The beſt thing, the anonymous Author has advanced, is the example of the Apoſtle's prophecy with regard to the laſt coming of the ſon of God. They declared it as near at hand (16); and nevertheleſs ſeventeen hundred years have been elapſed, without its being yet fulfilled. The ſolution of this difficulty may be ſeen in the commentaries on ſcripture. I ſhall only obſerve, that this was never thought a reaſon ſufficient to juſtify thoſe, who, in the ſucceeding ages, foretold things that never came to paſs. The world always imagined they had a right to call them falſe Prophets, or falſe interpreters of the Revelations. Why ſhall I be the only perſon who may not be allowed to employ ſuch an argument, to refute ſuch as pretend to prophecy? It is well known that thoſe, who are engaged to vindicate the new Prophets, anſwer the objections, as this anonymous Author does, at the expence of the true Scripture Prophets. They have not forgot the paſtoral letters of the Writer whom he ſpoke of ſome pages before. Who declares (17), I know not how many great and ſmall imaginary Prophets, to be inſpired; and who expects that his party in France will be re-eſtabliſhed, by way of inſpiration. It was to no purpoſe that he ſought, in the behaviour of the Prophets of the Old Teſtament, what was conſidered as marks of falſe prophecy in thoſe pretended inſpired ones of Dauphiné; perſons of wiſdom and piety nevertheleſs concluded, in oppoſition to thoſe perſons, what right reaſon might infer from thoſe marks; and when the time fixed upon for the deliverance was expired, they aſſerted that his prophetical interpretations were falſe. They were not afraid that the prediction concerning Chriſt's ſecond coming, which the anonymous writer alledges, would be alledged againſt them. I imitate the conduct of thoſe Gentlemen, which has been obſerved by all the graveſt Divines, whenever any Fanaticks ſtarted up, whoſe predictions have been refuted by the event.

(16) They exhorted ſuch of the faithful as they then addreſſed, to keep themſelves in readineſs for it.

(17) Lettre touchant les Auteurs Myſtiques, p. 108.

I muſt now anſwer another complaint made by Mrs. Bourignon's advocate. He is of opinion that I take a ſingular pleaſure in ſatyriſing her, and expatiates largely on this. He adds, that I frequently refer my readers to a libel of Mr. de Seckendorf; and cites a long paſſage from Mr. Thomaſius, Profeſſor at Hall, which ſhews, that Mr. de Seckendorf was blinded by paſſion when he wrote againſt Mrs. Bourignon. I anſwer in few words, 1. That none but perſons, who are prepoſſeſſed by an infatuating admiration, could charge me with a pretended deſire of ſatyriſing her. Enraptured with the perfections they fancy they perceive in a certain perſon, they cannot diſcover any imperfection in ſuch an one; they conſecrate all their actions, and are highly exaſperated at all thoſe who diſcover any penetration, and who dare to ſhew the weak ſide of ſuch a perſon. I have not ſaid any thing reflecting in any manner either on the chaſtity or zeal of Antoinette Bourignon; I drew up, with plainneſs and ſimplicity, a ſhort account of her life; and I referred my readers to a ſmall piece communicated to me by Mr. Poiret, which our anonymous Writer looks upon as highly advantageous to the young woman in queſtion. If I imagined that it was lawful for me, as an hiſtorian, to take ſome notice of her petulant humour, and the watchful eye with which ſhe managed her fortune, I did no more than what truth required. I have advanced nothing without proofs. But I will leave the deciſion of all this to unprejudiced readers. I anſwer, 2dly, that among a great number of citations out of Antionette's life and works, ſcarce more than five or ſix are taken from Mr. de Seckendorf. Wherefore then does our anonymous Author inſinuate that I ground myſelf entirely on that account. Laſtly, I ſay, that I did not then know what Mr. Thomaſius obſerves with regard to the procedure of that illuſtrious German. Mr. Thomaſius is a worthy Gentleman, for whom I have long had a great regard. I have no occaſion to oppoſe his remarks; for he ſeems to have accuſed Mr. de Seckendorf with curtailing ſome paſſages only in what relates to the tenets of Mrs. Bourignon; and as to myſelf, I only quoted him for a matter of fact; and I generally confirm, by other paſſages, what I have taken from him. I have no reaſon to believe that ſhe was blinded in this reſpect, by prejudice. After all, if he was ſo guilty as is pretended, would he not have been attacked on all hands? Would not Mr. Poiret, whom he refuted, have reſumed the pen to ſhew his unfair dealing?

I make no anſwer to ſeveral obſervations made by the anonymous Writer. They all are random reproaches, and manifeſt indications of his being too touchy, and the need he ſtill has to mortify his internal ſenſes. It is not enough that a perſon mortifies his external ſenſes; but he ought to make it his chief endeavours to overcome his iraſcible appetite. I would adviſe him to think ſeriouſly of it, and refer him either to the obſervations I have already made (18), or to the following general obſervation, that nothing could be more trifling and inſignificant than to attempt a juſtification with regard to complaints advanced without any direct proofs. If any perſon raiſes a particular objection to me, and examines certain arguments fairly taken from ſome part of my Dictionary, I will not refuſe ſuch a perſon an anſwer; but with regard to general reproaches, I ſhall content myſelf with appealing to all unbiaſſed Readers.

(18) In my reflections on the Judgment of the public, which he cited in his letter Sur les Auteurs Myſtiques, p. 312, 313.

RUA (PETER), a learned Spaniard, who taught polite literature in Soria, the place of his birth [A], lived in the 16th Century. He publiſhed three letters (a) againſt Antonio de Guevara, which are very curious, and filled with great erudition; wherein he refuted a numberleſs multitude of falſities publiſhed by that Author, and the ridiculous ſubterfuge he employed. This will appear from the paſſage of Andreas Schottus which I quote [B]. Moreri has committed a very groſs blunder [C].

(a) Entitled, Cartes del Bachiller Rua. Nicol. Anton. Bibli. Hiſt. Tom. 2. p. 187.

[A] In Soria, the place of his birth.] One would conclude, at firſt ſight, that Andrew Schottus and Don Nicholas Antonio are not agreed in any manner. The former ſays, Petrus Rhua Numantinus primum Abulæ, poſt Numantiæ in patria annos plurimos ad extremam uſque ætatem bonas literas docuit (1). i. e. "Peter Rua, a Numantine, taught philoſophy, firſt "in Abula, and afterwards in Numantia, the place "of his birth, for many years, to a very old age." The latter writes thus: Petrus Rua, Sorienſis, Abulæ primum, mox in patria urbe juventutem humanioribus imbuit literis ad extremam uſque ætatem (2). i. e. "Peter Rua, of Soria, firſt in Abula, and afterwards "in the city where he was born, inſtructed youth "in learning, till he was very far advanced in "years." But theſe Writers ſay exactly the ſame thing in the main; for Soria, built near the ruins of Numantia, is called Numantia by ſome; and among others, by Andrew Schottus.

(1) Andr. Schottus, Bibl. Hiſp. 567.

(2) Nicol. Ant. Bibl. Script. Hiſpan. Tom. 2. 187.

[B] This will appear from the paſſage of Andrew Schottus which I quote. It is as follows: In quo egregie verſatum fuiſſe teſtantur, epiſt. 3. Hiſpanicè ſcriptæ eruditionis plenæ, & humanitatis ſatis copioſæ: quibus Ant. Guevarræ (qui tum ſolus doctrinæ, & eloquentiæ arcem tenere videbatur) errores, mendaciaque in hiſtoriis antiquorum, veteribuſque monumentis lapidum, & nummorum explicandis, egregie refellit. Valde ut mirer Gallos, Guevarræ epiſtolas converſas Aureo titulo decoraſſe, manibuſque ita tenere ſolitos, ut pro oraculis circumferant, quæ tot mendaciis, quot verſibus ſcatere dicantur. Rhua itaque de tot millibus multa indicavit, facemque prætulit, ne quis poſthac credulus in errorem induceretur. Epiſt. 1. numiſmatum inſcriptiones, & confinxiſſe, & ridicule explicaſſe, in Chronologia & magiſtratuum dignitate turpiter hallucinatum. Epiſt. 2. erraſſe in Hiſtoria Rom. temporum ratione, locorumque nominibus, ſolenne illud ſuum ſervando, audacter ut omnia pronunciet, quaſi poſteris imponere volens, aut credens omnes ei temere aſſenſuros audito illo Pythagoreorum αὐτὸς ἔφα, cornicum oculos confixit, citans identidem, & prodigioſa nomina propria hiſtoricorum, cudenſque arbitratu ſuo, ad hanc diem inaudita. De numiſmatis inepta & ridicula leges; ut & de legibus Rom. & legum auctorib. de lege Julia Poppæa, Carnelia, Falcidia, aliiſque: de medicina & empirica. Tertia epiſtola ut mole ſua ita rerum pondere cæteris major eſt. Cum enim Guevarra omnem antiquitati fidem derogare niteretur, epiſtola quadam, quo ficta mendacia tegeret, velaret, vel tueretur; cum à ſacris litteris diſceſſeris, omnia incerta fabuliſque plena affirmat. Refellit virum deſerte Rhua ex Athenagoræ Apologia pro Chriſtianis, & hoc eſſe omnem artium tractationem, fidemque ut ſocietatis humanæ, ita & ſcientiarum vinculum è medio tollere (3). i. e. "His great knowledge in this appears "from his three epiſtles, written in the Spaniſh "tongue, and filled with erudition. He therein "excellently well confutes the miſtakes and falſities "of Anthony Guevara, who then ſeemed to be the "only maſter of learning and eloquence with regard "to ancient hiſtory, and the explication of inſcriptions on ſtones and coins. I am greatly ſurpriſed "that the French ſhould have adorned the title of "the verſion of Guevara's epiſtles, with the epithet "golden; and ſhould ſtudy and carry them about "with them as though they were ſo many oracles, "though they contain as many errors as lines. Rua "therefore, from among ſo many thouſands, pointed "out ſeveral, and held forth a light, that no perſon "might hereafter be miſled by their credulity. His "firſt epiſtle ſhews, that Guevara has forged, and "given a ridiculous explanation to the inſcriptions "of coins; and that he committed moſt ſhameful "blunders in chronology and the dignity of Magiſtrates. By the ſecond epiſtle it appears that he "committed errors in the Roman Hiſtory, with "regard to chronology, the names of places; boldly aſſerting, as is cuſtomary with him, on all "things, as though he deſigned to impoſe on poſterity; or imagining that all perſons would lightly "give credit to him; frequently citing, and inventing at pleaſure, ſtrange names of hiſtorians, never "heard of to this day. He has advanced many "filly and ridiculous particulars with reſpect to coins; "as alſo concerning the Roman laws, and the Authors of them; of the Julian, Poppæan, Cornelian, Falcidian, &c. and of Phyſick. The third "epiſtle, as it is longer than the others, ſo the "ſubject of it is of more conſequence: for Guevara, "in a certain epiſtle, endeavouring to deſtroy as "much as poſſible the credit of all antiquity; he, "in order to ſcreen or defend his falſities, affirms "that all writings, the Scripture excepted, are uncertain and ſtuffed with fables. But Rua has expreſsly confuted him, from Athenagoras's apology "for the Chriſtians; and ſhews, that this would deſtroy the whole foundation of the arts, ſciences, "and the bonds by which mankind are united in "ſociety." This is a curious Supplement to Guevara's article.

(3) Andr. Schottus, Bibl. Hiſp. 567.

[C] Moreri has made a very groſs blunder,] He ſays that Peter Rhua wrote a treatiſe De Lege Julia, Poppæa, Cornelia, Falcidia, &c. de Medicina & Empyrica; and cites Father Schottus. What a horrid blunder is this! This Father ſays very plainly, not that Rhua wrote a treatiſe on theſe ſubjects; but that the deſign of his ſecond epiſtle was to ſhew the errors committed by Guevara in ſeveral matters, and particularly in that. Beſides, Lex Julia and Lex Poppæa are not different laws, but one and the ſame, which Father Schottus ſhews plainly enough, he not putting a comma between Julia and Poppæa.

RUARUS (MARTIN), a Socinian Miniſter, was born in Krempen (a) in Germany. He was infected with the Socinian hereſy by Erneſt Sonerus, Profeſſor in Altdorf, who taught them ſecretly; and perſevered ſo obſtinately in them, that he choſe to loſe his patrimony, rather than quit the above-mentioned principles. He was eſteemed both in his own, and in foreign countries, for his judgment, learning, and rectitude of mind (b). He was principal of the College of Racovia, and afterwards Paſtor to the Socinians of Dantzic, both in the city, and in the town of Straſſin; and died in that quality in 1657 (c), aged ſeventy years (d). He was a Miniſter in 1635, as appears from the travels of James (a) Ogier [A]. He wrote ſome pieces which have (a) A city of Holſtein.

(b) Ob eruditionis, judiciique præſtantiam, morumque integritatem, in magno & apud iſtos & alios eruditos fuit pretio. Mollerus, Iſagoge ad Hiſt. Cherſoneſ. Cimbricæ, part. 3. p. 106.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Sandius, in Bibl. Antitrinit. p. 114.

[A] From the travels of James Ogier.] This Author was at Dantzic in 1635, in the retinue of Count d'Avaux, his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's Embaſſador. He relates, that being in a bookſeller's-ſhop, one Ruardus (he ſhould have ſaid Ruarus) came up to him, and that he diſcourſed for two hours with him in Latin, and afterwards in French. Aggreſſus me eſt quidam N. Ruardus, quocum per duas horas collocutus ſum Latinè, ac deinde Gallicè, qui me ad ædes ſuas adeundas invitavit. Didici poſtea ab aliquo, eum eſſe Arianorum have been printed [B]. The famous Calixtus employed his utmoſt endeavours to convert him, during the conference of Thorn in 1646, but to no purpoſe (e).

(e) Nulli ut popularium hunc ſuum in viam revocaret, peperci opera, ſed pertinaciam ejus ſuperare non potuit. Mollerus, Iſagoge ad Hiſt. Cherſ. Cimbricæ, part. 3. p. 107.

rianorum Paſtorem : ſunt quippe Gedani hujuſmodi homines, qui clam congregantur, inſcio vel diſſimulante Senatu (1). i. e. "There came up to me one N. Ruarus, "with whom I diſcourſed two hours in Latin, and "then in French, and he invited me to his houſe. "Some perſons told me afterwards, that he was "Paſtor of the Arians: for there are ſuch perſons in "Dantzic, who aſſemble ſecretly, either unknown "to, or by the connivance of the Senate."

(1) Carol. Ogerius, in Itiner. Polonico, p. 418, 419.

§ (α) It ſhould be Charles Ogier, as Bayle calls him here in the margin, citation (1), in the remark [Q] of the article ULEFELD. Here follows the complete title of his travels: Caroli Ogerii Ephemerides, ſive iter Danicum, Suecicum, Polonicum, cum eſſet in comitatu Illuſtriſſ. Claudii Munici, Comitis Avenuxii, ad Septentrionis regis extraordinarii Legati. Lutetiæ Pariſiorum, apud Petrum Le Petit 1636, in 8vo. He has been called Ogier the Dane, becauſe of his journey to Denmark. His brother the Prior was called Francis. REM. CRIT.

[B] He wrote ſome pieces which have been printed.] He wrote notes on the Catechiſm of the Socinian Churches of Poland, which notes were added to the edition of this Catechiſm printed in 1665, and they alſo are inſerted in the edition of 1680. He wrote other notes on the ſame piece, but they were never printed (2). There are two centuries of his letters; the firſt was printed at Amſterdam by DAVID RUARUS, the Author's ſon, in 1677, with a Preface by JOACHIN RUARUS, David's brother. The ſecond century was alſo printed in 1681, by David, who added a Preface to them. Theſe letters are very curious (3). He was thought to be Author of the German verſion of the New Teſtament, made in Racovia, and publiſhed in 1630 (4), but it is an error, *Quos falli mihi conſtat, tum ex Sandio , illam Johann. Crellio & Joach. Stegmanno Seniori vindicante, tum ex indicio Filii, quem noſter reliquit, cognominis, Amſtelodami viventis, à quo, adornatum eam credi à Chriſtoph. Oſtorodo ac συνέργοις aliquot, reviſam autem eſſe à toto Societate, & in hac parente ſuo, ac præfationem tandem à Crellio adjectam, A. 1684, ſum edoctus (5). i. e. "Whom I am "ſure are miſtaken, as well from Sandius's a- "ſcribing it to John Crellius, and Joachim Steg- "mannus the elder; as likewiſe from the information "of his ſon, of the ſame name, now reſiding in "Amſterdam, who told me that it was thought to "have been prepared by Chriſtopher Oſtorodus, &c. "and reviſed by the whole ſociety; and by his fa- "ther, among others; and that at laſt, Crellius add- "ed a preface to it."

(2) Extracted from Sandius, in Bibl. Antitrinit. p. 114.

(3) Eruditæ & lectu digniſſimæ. Mollerus, Iſagoge ad Hiſt. Cherſ. Cimbricæ, part 3. p. 107. See Morhof, Polyhiſt. cap. 24. p. 309.

(4) See Matt. Zimmermanni, Diſſert. inaug. de acceptilatione, p. 27 and 31. apud Mollerum, ibid.

* In Bibl. Ant. p. 94, 116, 133.

(5) Mollerus, ibid.

RUBENUS (LEONARD), born at Eſſen (a) in Germany, entered into the Order of St. Benedict at Colen, the 11th of July 1596 (b). He had ſpent many years in Livonia, Lithuania, and Tranſylvania, to advance the Romiſh Religion. He was in Tranſylvania in 1588, and there publiſhed ſome theſes or poſitions concerning idolatry, and dedicated them to Prince Sigiſmund Battori. He propoſed them in a publick diſputation, but no one offered to oppoſe them. He was deſired, in ſeveral places, to publiſh a ſecond edition of them; for which reaſon he ſet about that ſubject again, and treated it more at large (c); and it ſwelled to a book containing 327 pages in 8vo, which he printed at Colen in 1597. A particular related by him ſhews, that Livonia was ſtill infected with the errors of the Heathens [A]. Konig knew nothing of this Author, except that he ſet about a work De falſis Prophetis (concerning falſe Prophets) in 1600 (d).

(a) A little town within three leagues of the Rhine and of Duisburg.

(b) See the dedication to his treatiſe de Idololatria.

(c) See his advertiſement to the Reader.

(d) In the catalogue of the Bodleian library is a work of Leonardus Rubenus, de falſis Prophetis & Lupis rapacibus, printed at Paderborn, in 8vo, anno 1606.

[A] A particular related by him ſhews, that Livonia was ſtill infected with the errors of the Heathens.] Having received an order from his ſuperiors to go to Dorpat, which is very near the farthermoſt town in Livonia; he met, in his journey, with the ſacred woods and groves of the Eſtonians. He there ſaw a pine-tree of a prodigious height and bulk, the branches of which were filled with ſeveral pieces of old cloth; and the roots covered with many bundles of ſtraw and hay. Enquiring of a man in the neighbourhood what that meant, he was told, that the inhabitants hereabouts worſhipped that tree, and that ſuch women as had a happy delivery, carried thoſe bundles of hay thither. That they alſo uſed, at certain ſeaſons, to offer up a hogſhead of beer to it, and to throw a hogſhead of that liquor into the lake of Marienburg, whenever it thundered; that they looked upon thunder as the ſon of God, and thought he was appeaſed by the pouring out of that liquor. He aſked for a good ax, that which he had in his chariot being blunt; and being aſked what he intended to do; I'll ſhew you, ſays he, the weakneſs of this object of your worſhip. The Eſthonian replied, that he would run the utmoſt danger in what he intended; and cried out aloud to him, not to go under that tree, for that, if he ventured to do it, both himſelf and his chariot would be carried up into the air. Nevertheleſs, he drove his horſes under it, when taking up his ax, he in a devout manner, cut the figure of a croſs on the tree; and for fear leſt that figure, made by a man whom they honoured ſo highly as to call him the great Temple of God, ſhould increaſe their ſuperſtition, he cut a gibbet on the ſame pine-tree, when laughing at them, there, (ſays he), is your God (1).

(1) Extracted from Rubenus, lib. 1. de Idololatria, cap. 18. p. 66.

RUCELLAI (JOHN), a noble Florentine, and a good Poet, lived in the 16th Century. I obſerved on another occaſion (a), that he wrote in 1524, at Rome, a Poem entitled, Le Api (the Bees) to which I now add, that he was then Governor of St. Angelo; and that PALLA RUCELLAI, his brother, printed that Poem in Florence, anno 1539 in 8vo, and dedicated it to Gio. Giorgio Triſſino, Author of Italia liberata da Goti (Italy delivered from the Goths) printed at Rome in 1547. John Ruccellai compoſed alſo a Tragedy, entitled, Oreſte, which is mentioned by Leo Allazzi, page 605 of his Drammaturgia (b).

(a) In the rem. [E], of the art. ORICELLARIUS, towards the cloſe.

(b) Extracted from Bibl. Aproſiana, p. 458, 459.

RUFFI (ANTHONY DE), Counſellor in the Seneſchal's Court of Marſeilles, the place of his birth, diſcharged the duties of his employment with the greateſt integrity, and the utmoſt, and moſt ſingular ſcrupulouſneſs of conſcience. He alſo applied himſelf to hiſtorical enquiries, with wonderful application and patience. This appears from his hiſtory of Marſeilles printed in 1642, which was reprinted with large additions in 1696, in two volumes in folio (a). He was but thirty five years old when it was firſt printed. He was honoured with the poſt of Counſellor of State in 1554, as a teſtimony of

(a) See Hiſt. des Ouvrages des Savans, for June 1697.

of the eſteem which was paid to his learning and merit. The proof I ſhall give of the ſcrupulouſneſs of his conſcience [A], will give me occaſion to debate a queſtion with regard to the ignorance that excuſeth from ſin; and to examine the anſwers that may be made to the compariſons taken either from judges whoſe ſentences are unjuſt, contrary

[A] The ſcrupulouſneſs of his conſcience.] We "may "judge of this, from the reſtitution he made to a "perſon, whoſe cauſe he had reported, imagining he "had not allowed time enough for the examination "of a law-ſuit in which he was concerned; and to "have contributed to the loſs of it by his being a "little negligent; ſo far from ſearching for ſuch "excuſes and reaſons as ſelf-love never fails to ſug-"geſt, in ſuch examinations, he paſt a very ſevere "ſentence upon himſelf, and got a Prieſt of the ora-"tory to reſtore the ſum which had been loſt; on "which occaſion, the ſcrupulouſneſs of the Judge's "conſcience might have been more favourable to the "party concerned, than a more ſtrict enquiry into "his right and his reaſons would have been. And "indeed, this great probity of Ruffi was acknow-"ledged in an authentick manner by the Parliament "of Provence, in an arret or decree paſſed in 1655, "at the deſire of the King's Attorney-General." This paſſage is extracted from the elogium of Mr. de Ruffi (1), immediately after theſe words: He never ſeated himſelf upon the bench, but his mind was filled with that Court of Juſtice, which the royal Prophet hints at in one of his pſalms; God was preſent in the aſſembly of the Gods, and being in the midſt of them, he judged them; ſtetit in ſynagoga Deorum in medio autem Deos dijudicat: poſſeſſed with the ſentiments which ſuch a thought is capable of inſpiring, he weighed every thing in the balance of the ſanctuary: neither the ties of blood and charity, the dangerous allurements of friendſhip, nor the force of intereſt, ever made him ſwerve from the dictates of juſtice. He employed every expedient which might bring to him a knowledge of truth; the reſolution with which he defended innocence, and puniſhed guilt, was equal to his penetration; and he never gave his opinion, nor pronounced ſentence, without ſeriouſly conſidering whether he could maintain it, at the tribunal of that ſevere God, who, at the laſt day, will judge the righteouſneſs of men.

(1) It is prefixed to the 2d edit. of the Hiſt. of Marſeilles.

Remarks concerning ignorance that excuſes.

It was neceſſary for me to obſerve, that theſe laſt words precede immediately thoſe which inform us, that he reſtored a ſum of money which a client had loſt. This gives me an opportunity of making a reflection which I look upon as pretty important. The Author of the elogium means, without doubt, that Mr. de Ruffi had examined the cauſe with his uſual accuracy and diligence; but that he, from too rigid a ſcrupulouſneſs, imagined he had been a little negligent. This Author, I ſay, no doubt would have us ſuppoſe, that this Judge's ſcruples were grounded on the information he had received ſince he had pronounced the decree. Here follows, in few words, the ſenſe in which we are to underſtand this affair. The judge, who reported his cauſe, employed all his knowledge, his utmoſt application, and integrity on this occaſion; but after ſentence had been pronounced on the cauſe, he diſcovered, by I know not what method, that the party, which had loſt the cauſe, had more right than he at firſt imagined. He therefore imagined, that had he more cloſely examined all the writings, he would have made a more favourable report; whence he concluded, that he was not innocent, and therefore thought himſelf obliged to make reſtitution; whence one would conclude, that he had a very tender and ſcrupulous conſcience. This could not be ſaid of him, if his memory ſuggeſted to him an affected negligence, indolence or impatience; for, on ſuch an occaſion, a Judge who reports a cauſe, is evidently guilty; his ignorance does not excuſe him; and though he be troubled with remorſe, this is no indication that he has a tender conſcience; for a perſon might have a hard conſcience, and yet be ſtrongly allarmed by inward convictions. But I ſuppoſe, in conſequence of the expreſſions employed by the Writer of the elogium, that Mr. de Ruffi had no ſuch reproaches to make himſelf. It was his ſincere intention to make a faithful report; he had not neglected any thing which he thought neceſſary; and was ſenſible that, in a hundred other cauſes, the attention with which he had examined this, had been ſufficient. He therefore reproached himſelf only for imagining he had done all that a juſt man who reports a cauſe ought to do; he having found, that it was poſſible for him to have made a better report of that cauſe than he had done. Since his conſcience would not let him be eaſy in ſuch circumſtances, it might have diſturbed him even though he had known that it was ſcarce poſſible, humanly ſpeaking, to do better than he had done, and that his ignorance was invincible. To what purpoſe is all this, will my reader ſay to me? But this will ſoon appear.

Within theſe ten years (2) ſome pieces have been publiſhed in Holland, relating to the rights of an erroneous conſcience. Such Authors as have aſſerted, that ignorance does not excuſe, have inſtanced ſome Saints, who had an extreme regret for what they had done with a good intention, and in the deſign of ſerving God, and imagined that they ſtood in need of mercy, &c. Such examples, generally ſpeaking, prove nothing; for tender conſciences, ſuch as glow with a love for virtue, are troubled at a fault that is purely material, I mean ſuch a one as has been committed through invincible ignorance. A Phyſician who ſhould be informed by revelation, that a doſe he adminiſtred proved the death of his patient, notwithſtanding that, according to all the rules of the art of Phyſick, and all the knowledge mankind are capable of, he ought to have preſcribed it him; ſuch a Phyſician, I ſay, who was very conſcientious and kind, would be prodigiouſly grieved at what he had done. He would allow for it, to the utmoſt of his power, by beſtowing alms to the family of his deceaſed patient, in caſe they were reduced to poverty by loſing their head. He would nevertheleſs be entirely innocent before the Almighty; for I take it for granted that his ignorance was invincible, and ſuch as it ought to be, to excuſe him, according to the opinion of the moſt ſevere Divines (3). Let us ſay the ſame, with regard to a Judge who ſhould have made a cauſe be loſt, in ſuch circumſtances wherein the utmoſt knowledge and penetration of mankind could not have diſcovered the truth. He would be grieved for the ſentence, in caſe he afterwards diſcovered the right of the party who had loſt his ſuit; he would be grieved at it, I ſay, and compenſate for the loſs, in caſe his conſcience and virtue were perfect. The Author of the elogium of Mr. de Ruffi furniſhes us with an example of this. Such a grief, and ſuch compenſations, ought not therefore to be alledged, as a proof that undeſigned ignorance does not excuſe. The more pious a perſon is, the more he is grieved for ſuch material faults as he may have committed through miſtake. Conſcience, either out of humility or precaution, becomes more ſevere than God himſelf. A thouſand inſtances might be cited, in which a man, though innocent, grieves, compenſates, reſtores, &c. Does not an honeſt man, who hears that his horſe has lamed ſome perſon, grieve very much on that account? Does he not ſometimes pay the ſurgeon who attends the perſon thus hurt? And if he has a very tender conſcience, is he not afraid that God will call him to an account for his negligence, and for keeping ſo vicious an animal? Nevertheleſs, all Caſuiſts of good ſenſe will pronounce this honeſt man innocent, if they know that he could not help what his horſe had done? Would not an Orator who had been at a ſtand, and by that very involuntary misfortune had prejudiced another perſon, be extremely grieved at it? But in caſe he begged pardon of God for it, and compenſated for the injury he had done, muſt we conclude that he had ſinned; muſt we transform that into a moral fault, what is merely a phyſical imperfection, which is as independent on our reaſon, and liberty, as the weakneſs of the eye, ſuddenly dazled by too ſtrong a light flaſhing upon it? I take it for granted, that the Orator neglected nothing that he knew was neceſſary, for the well retaining all his ſpeech. But let us keep to the ignorance of upright Judges.

(2) I write this in Sept. 1697.

(3) The reader may have ſeen rem. [A] of the art. RIMINI, that they acknowledge, properly ſpeaking, no invincible ignorance in religious matters; but they are not ſo rigid with reſpect to facts, and human eſtabliſhments or diſcipline.

trary to their intention [B] ; or from Phyſicians whoſe medicines, ſpite of their honeſty and Judges. The firſt Preſident of the Parliament of Paris, made a ſpeech at the opening of that Court, in 1693. He repreſented, that when a Judge imagines he has not every expedient in order to get light into an affair, he nevertheleſs commits injuſtice, at the ſame time that he ſuppoſes he is pronouncing an equitable decree ; as was manifeſt from the cauſe of the late Mr. Langlade, in which, notwithſtanding the skill and underſtanding of the Judge, and all the care they took in that matter, in order to find out the truth, yet could not prevent their condemning an innocent man, which they had endeavoured to repair by their ſentence (4). Here then we have Judges of integrity and application, who do their duty to the utmoſt of their abilities, and who yet are grieved at their miſtake, and have atoned for it. Had theſe been ſnatched away by death, before they had diſcovered their miſtake, and with a conſcioufneſs that they had employed their utmoſt endeavours to find out the truth, need they be under any dread with regard to the divine juſtice? Can it be pretended, that they were obliged to overcome ſome obſtacles, which, with regard to them, were invincible. See the Author of the Commentaire Philoſophique (5), who has ſo fully ſhewn, that in certain caſes, an innocent man may be condemned, and a guilty one acquitted, without ſinning, that the learned Miniſter of Utrecht wrote againſt him (6) has not attacked this doctrine.

(4) Mercure Gallant, for Nov. 1693. p. 315.

(5) In the Supplement, p. 33. & ſeq. p. 62 & ſeq. to p. 81. See alſo Montagne's Eſſays, book 3. chap. 13. p. m. 518.

(6) See Mr. Saurin's Reflexions ſur les droits de la Conſcience, printed at Utrecht, in 1697.

[B] I ſhall . . . . examine the anſwers that may be made from the compariſons taken from Judges, whoſe ſentences are unjuſt, contrary to their intention.] Ought ignorant Judges, will my reader ſay, to be excuſed, they who occaſion ſo many diſorders? Don't you know that they are puniſhed? For if the party aggrieved addreſſes the Sovereign, or ſome ſuperior Court, their ſentence is annulled, they are cenſured, and even ſometimes degraded? Such is the uſual courſe of juſtice among men. Now if Princes puniſh in this manner ſuch as are ignorant of their laws, will any one preſume to ſay, that God will not puniſh thoſe who are ignorant of his word? This compariſon is conſequently not advantageous to ſuch as preach up for toleration. I have three things to anſwer.

I. A Judge who, through a profound ignorance, ſhould take the wrong way in a cauſe that might have been very eaſily judged, would doubtleſs deſerve to be degraded, not as a diſhoneſt man, in caſe he had followed the dictates of his conſcience (7), with a firm reſolution to do juſtice to the parties concerned ; but as a diſhoneſt man, who was no ways qualified for that employment ; and if thoſe who degrade him, knew the rectitude of his heart, they would declare him a good man, conſcientious, a lover of juſtice ; and would ſhew in the moſt authentic manner that he only wanted learning. It is juſt as if an Embaſſador ſhould diſcharge his Secretary, whoſe hand is not very legible, though he knew perfectly that he was a man of fidelity and capacity. He would not pretend to brand him as a diſhoneſt man, or a fool ; but would only ſay that he was not fit for his purpoſe, becauſe he could not write a good hand. Let us compare two Judges, the one very learned, and the other a perſon of ſmall abilities, and both of them of equal integrity. If one of theſe, in a cauſe, be for the affirmative, and the other for the negative ; if they act according to the dictates of their conſcience, in this caſe, after both have employed their utmoſt application and diligence to diſcover the truth ; though the opinion of the moſt learned Judge be juſt, and that of the other unjuſt, I aſſert that, with regard to the rectitude of the mind, one does not ſurpaſs the other. I grant that he is a better judge, and better qualified for his employment, becauſe the qualifications of an upright judge comprehend knowledge and rectitude of mind ; but he has no more probity, nor is more zealous for juſtice.

(7) Suppoſing that ſuch a Judge can be ſaid to have a very upright conſcience. See citat. 10, below.

II. With regard to that uſual courſe of puniſhing ignorant judges, mentioned to us, I do not know whether any inſtances could be produced of this. Nothing is more common than for a cauſe, loſt in an inferior Court, to be gained in a ſuperior Court. But this does not throw an odium on thoſe Courts whoſe decrees are not confirmed. The inferior Judges are neither removed or cenſured, unleſs there happen to be ſome plain indications of bribery or partiality ; or at leaſt, of the moſt groſs ignorance ; and if it be thought that a Court has judged according to the beſt of its knowledge, though ever ſo ſmall, the ſuperiors go no farther than to correct their decrees. I would wiſh one ſingle inſtance could be given of Judges removed for their want of knowledge, at the ſame time that they were looked upon as conſcientious, incorruptible, and extremely diligent in examining the ſeveral cauſes that came before them. I am perſuaded that when Judges are puniſhed, it is always on the ſuppoſition that they have been bribed ; were turned away by paſſion or prejudice, or were guilty of wilful ignorance. But here follows an expreſs inſtance to confirm the opinion laid down in the Commentaire Philoſophique. " Though we pretend " to be innocent, it does not follow that the Judges " are unjuſt ; it not being an inconſiſtency, with re- " gard to Courts of Judicature, which are compoſed " of men, who may deceive or be impoſed upon by " others, for an innocent man to be condemned, and " a criminal cleared, by an upright Judge. It fre- " quently happens in cauſes both civil and criminal, " that Judges are often divided in opinion, where " the caſe is doubtful, and yet all of them ſhall be " directed by the law. It likewiſe may happen that " all of them are unjuſt, both thoſe who acquit, " and thoſe who condemn, notwithſtanding this con- " trariety in opinions, every one judging agreeably " to the dictates of his conſcience *. When King " Henry II. their Predeceſſor had heard that Peliſ- " ſon, Preſident in the Parliament at Chamberry, at " that time belonging to France, had been removed " from his employment, by a decree of the Parlia- " ment of Dijon, at the ſuit of Tabouet the King's " Attorney ; and that the cauſe being afterwards " brought before the Parliament of Paris, by virtue " of an order for that purpoſe, Peliſſon was cleared, " and the Attorney condemned : the King, I ſay, " cleared all the Judges, notwithſtanding this con- " trariety of their opinions, with ſaying, that ſome " had judged according to the dictates of their con- " ſcience, and others purſuant to the merits of the " cauſe (8)."

* Reſponſe du Roy Henry II. ſur deux jugemens contraires.

III. We muſt not depart from the true ſtate of the queſtion. The Author of the Commentaire Philoſophique compares together thoſe who miſtake in a lawſuit, and ſuch as err in religious controverſies : but he ſuppoſes that neither of them ought to be excuſed, unleſs they have ſincerely and cordially employed the utmoſt efforts of their genius and underſtanding to find out the truth. When he ſays that there are ſome caſes in which Judges condemn an innocent perſon, and abſolve a criminal, without incurring any guilt themſelves ; he ſuppoſed, at the ſame time, that they do all that lyes in their power, and whatever the laws enjoin, in order to diſcover the truth ; and that nothing but the intricacy of the cauſe, and which could not poſſibly be ſeen through, and thereby occaſioned their pronouncing a falſe ſentence, which however was conformable to the dictates of their conſcience, and the forms of proceeding in Law-Courts. If there are inſtances that ſuch Judges have been removed by ſuperiors who thought them equally learned and upright ; and if ſuch a removal appears juſt to wiſe people, there is ſome reaſon to draw conſequences from it, in favour of the opinion, that God will puniſh ſuch perſons as are ignorant, notwithſtanding their ſincerity. But if the very contrary is found among mankind, what will become of all thoſe conſequences? May we not juſtly infer quite contrary ones, and this in particular, that ſince Kings do not puniſh thoſe who, notwithſtanding all their application, and the utmoſt rectitude of mind, cannot help miſtaking in a very perplexed ſuit ; much more will God, who is juſtice and goodneſs itſelf, bear with thoſe who cannot diſcover the true ſenſe of a very obſcure paſſage in Scripture.

(8) Richeome, Plainte Apologetique au Roy Henry IV. pour les Jeſuites, p. m. 182.

I have two things more to ſay : one is, that a Judge who is groſsly ignorant, can ſcarcely be looked and ſkill prove mortal [C]. Our Ruffi lived to ieghty two years of age. We cannot diſcover from the elogium cited by me (b), either the year of his birth, or that of his death, which is an omiſſion which deſerves cenſure [D]. LEWIS ANTHONY DE RUFFI, his ſon, had a hand in the additions to the ſecond edition of the Hiſtory of Marſeilles.

(b) See his elogium prefixed to the Hiſtory of Marſeilles, publiſhed in 1696, writen by Peter Anthony de Paſcal, his nephew, a Monk belonging to the abbey of Toronet.

upon as a good man; for this ſuppoſes that he neglected to inſtruct himſelf; and that he either is inexcuſably indolent (9) or too much devoted to his pleaſures. It is impoſſible for that man to have an upright conſcience (10), who conducts himſelf in this manner, in the exerciſe of ſuch an employment; and if ſuch a man is removed, it does not imply that he was puniſhed for his ſincerity, and involuntary ignorance. The ſecond thing I have to ſay is, that I advance all theſe obſervations only as ſo many doubts, or ſo many probabilities which may be examined; and without pretending to eſpouſe the cauſe or aſſert the doctrine of the Commentaire Philoſophique. And to ſhew the Reader, that it is no ways my intention to extenuate the faults of a Judge which proceed merely from ignorance, I ſhall tranſcribe a fulminating judgment againſt them. "Mr. Lamoignon, the "firſt Preſident, would have thought he had been "wanting in the moſt eſſential duty of his office, "had he not endeavoured to improve the conſcious "rectitude of his intentions by knowledge. And indeed he uſed often to ſay, that there was but a "ſmall difference between a wicked and an ignorant "Judge. The former has, at leaſt, before his eyes, "the rules of his duty, and the image of his injuſtice; but the latter does not ſee the good or evil he "does; the former ſins with knowledge, and is the "more inexcuſable upon that account; but the latter "ſins without remorſe, and is more incorrigible: "but they are equally guilty with regard to ſuch as "they condemn, either through error or malice. If "a perſon is wounded by a mad or a blind man, he "feels his wound the ſame. And with regard to a "perſon who is ruined, it is little to the purpoſe if "his misfortunes were occaſioned, either by a man "who impoſed upon him, or by a man who was "impoſed upon (11)."

(9) Obſerve, that if ſuch a man ſtudied very cloſe, and yet continued very ignorant, this would denote a ſtupidity of mind. He therefore would deſerve condemnation, for ſetting himſelf up for a Judge; ſuch an one muſt not have examined himſelf; muſt have accepted of an employment that was above his abilities; and even continued in it, after he had found that his ſtudy was to no purpoſe.

(10) See citat. 7.

(11) Flechier, Oraiſon funebre de Mr. le premier Preſident de Lamoignon, p. 435, of the volume of his Oraiſons funebres, Dutch edit.

[C . . . . . or from Phyſicians, whoſe medicines, ſpite of their honeſty and ſkill, prove mortal.] I ſhall not be ſo prolix on this ſubject. A Phyſician, will my reader ſay, who, being firmly perſuaded that arſenic is a ſalutary medicine, ſhould preſcribe it to his patients, and by that means, ſend them by ſhoals into the other world, would be puniſhed, both in this life, and that which is to come, though he ſhould plead in excuſe his involuntary ignorance. This is the image of an Hereſiarch. I anſwer that it is impoſſible, morally ſpeaking, there ſhould be ſuch a Phyſician; and conſequently this is no fit example. No man can believe that arſenic is a ſalutary remedy, without being like thoſe who fancy themſelves to be Kings of France; that they are made of butter, and therefore that they muſt not come near the fire. The relations of ſuch perſons never let them go out of their ſight, or confine them in mad-houſes: and no perſon conſults them either in ſickneſs, or about a law-ſuit. If it be ſuppoſed that a chemiſt may ſincerely believe, that he is able to prepare arſenic in ſuch a manner as to make a ſalutary medicine of it, here is a good way how to form a judgment with regard to his ignorance. He either has tried the efficacy of that medicine, or he has not tried it. If he has not, we muſt ſuppoſe, either that he does not believe what he ſays, or that he is a madman. If he has made an experiment on it, and yet perſiſts in the ſame opinion, he may certainly be looked upon as a villain or a madman. An honeſt and ſincere ignorance ſuppoſes a perſon ſet about examining reaſons, with a ſincere deſire of finding out the truth of them; and without being prompted by avarice, pride, or an intention to cheat. We cannot reaſonably compare Hereſiarchs with ſuch an imaginary Phyſician, who murders ſo many people, unleſs ſuch Hereſiarchs had been eye-witneſſes to the eternal damnation of their firſt followers. If this ſhould not convert them, they muſt either be mad, or have ſpoke againſt the dictates of their conſcience; and in both theſe caſes, they ought to be delivered over to the Magiſtrate; in the former caſe, in order to be put into a mad-houſe; and in the ſecond, to ſuffer the puniſhment due to thoſe who blaſpheme the God they know. Toleration is not deſired for ſuch ſorts of people.

With regard to the puniſhment, before the Almighty, which that Phyſician would deſerve who had given his patient arſenic, it may eaſily be determined thus: if he was a mad-man, his actions would be judged like thoſe of madmen. If he was not a madman, it would be judged according as his ignorance had been voluntary or involuntary. Now by voluntary ignorance, we are to underſtand that which ariſes from idleneſs, or ſome other fault, which it is in our own power to amend.

[D] This is an omiſſion that deſerves cenſure.] Paulus Jovius, Scævola Sammarthanus, and ſeveral other panegyrical Writers have frequently been guilty of the ſame fault. Were they afraid that a date would ſpoil the cadence of a period? Were they ſtudious of brevity? How trifling would all ſuch excuſes be? If they were regulated by ſuch ridiculous motives, why did they not put in the margin what they are blamed for having omitted? I am certain that, on ſome occaſions, they were ſilent, becauſe they did not know in what year their heroes were born or died. The Author of the elogium of Ruffi cannot therefore be excuſed upon ſuch an ignorance. But, will it be ſaid in his favour, does not he ſay that the Hiſtory of Marſeilles was printed, when the Author was but five and thirty? Does not he ſay that the Author lived to the age of eighty two? Is it not eaſy to infer from thence that he was born in 1607, and died in 1689? I anſwer in the negative, becauſe he does not tell us that the Hiſtory of Marſeilles was printed in 1642; and that we do not find ſuch a date either in the dedication, in the Preface, in the King's licence, or in any part of the Prolegomena. Conſequently another book is wanted to diſcover the year in which this Author lived, and that in which he died. This conſequently is a fault; for with regard to ſuch particulars, a reader ſhould not be put to the trouble of conſulting other pages of the ſame book, much leſs ſhould he be obliged to have recourſe to another?

RUFINUS, the Emperor Theodoſius's favourite, "was born in Gaul, in the Pro- "vince of Aquitain (a), in mean circumſtances, but poſſeſſed an exalted genius; of a "ſupple, inſinuating, and polite turn, fit to divert a Prince, and capable even of do- "ing him ſervices. He came to the Court of Conſtantinople, where he got friends and "patrons; was known to Theodoſius, and ingratiated himſelf into his favour. He "made ſuch good uſe of this riſe of fortune, that he ſoon obtained conſiderable prefer- "ments. The Emperor appointed him high Steward of his Palace *; admitted him "into all his Counſels; honoured him with his friendſhip and confidence, and at laſt "made him Conſul with his ſon Arcadius. This man preſerved himſelf, as he had "begun, in his employments, by his artifices rather than his virtue. His ambition "grew with his fortune; he endeavouring to enrich himſelf with the ſpoils of thoſe "whom he oppreſſed by his calumnies †. Whoever poſſeſſed extraordinary merit, and "could contend with him for his exalted ſtation, was ſure to be his enemy. However, "being

(a) Born in Eluſis, according to Claudian. It was then the chief city of the country, now called Armagnac, in Gaſcony, properly ſo called.

* Zozim. l. 4. Ambr. Ep. 53.

† Claudian. l. 1. contra Ruff.

" being afraid of losing his Prince's friendship, in case he did not preserve his esteem, " he put on a shew of modesty and disinterestedness. He covered his evil Counsels " with the specious pretence of justice or policy; and knew so well how to set off his " good qualities, and conceal his bad ones, that the Emperor, though possessed of so " much knowledge, and so jealous of his authority, was frequently imposed upon and " governed without perceiving he was so. The chief Lords of the Court were exaspe- " rated at the rise of this favourite  ; accordingly they conspired against him, and " resolved to ruin him (b);" but all their endeavours proved either their own destruction, or strengthened his authority [A]. He was baptised with great pomp and ceremony in 394 [B]. His vexation to see Stilico above him, after Theodosius's death, prompted him to some treasonable attempts which undid him. He took advantage of his master's weakness; divided the Empires and the Emperors, by his secret practices with the Huns, the Goths, and the Alans; and attempted to make himself Sovereign, at least independent both on his masters and enemies (c). He was killed in 395 (d). See Moreri. His death put an end to the doubts, which Claudian entertained, with regard to a providence;

 Zos.

(b) Flechier, Hist. de Theodose, lib. 4. p. 433. Paris edit. 1680, 12mo.

(c) Idem, ibid. p. 500.

(d) But according to Mr. Flechier, ibid. p. 437, this must be the year 397.

[A] All their endeavours proved either their own destruction, or strengthened his authority.] The persons who conspired his ruin were (1) Timasius and Promotus, who were come from commanding the army, and had done some important services. . . . . Tatianus who had governed all the East during the absence of Theodosius, . . . and Proculus the son of Tatianus, Governor of Constantinople, a bold and enterprising young man. Rufinus being informed of all their machinations, prepossessed the Emperor in his favour, and represented to him (2), that the favours he received daily from his Majesty made him odious to the whole Court; that how careful soever he was to stop the murmurs of those who envied him, factions and cabals were daily formed against him; that he must inevitably sink, if he was not supported by the same hand which had raised him; that he was conscious of his own demerits; and gloried only in the kindness his Majesty was pleased to have for him, and the thankfulness he should for ever entertain on that account. Having in this manner engaged the Emperor to protect him, he not only endeavoured to guard against all snares, but also to ruin his enemies . . Being in the Council with Promotus, they disputed very warmly together *. The Emperor being gone out of the Council, their dispute broke out again; each insisted upon his opinion, and they grew warm insensibly. Rufinus speaking some injurious words, Promotus flew into a passion, and struck him in the face. . . . . The Emperor, to whom Rufinus went immediately and made his complaint, was highly exasperated. He openly declared, that he was weary of those divisions and intrigues, and those who were Authors of them; that he would oblige them to live without variance, and regard the persons for whom he had an affection; and that if the jealousy conceived against Rufinus did not cease, he would raise him so far above those who envied him, that they should be obliged to respect, and perhaps to obey him. This Prince, who spoke with authority, and could make himself be feared, whenever it was necessary, spoke those words with so much warmth, that no person dared to murmur. He banished Promotus from the Court; and bestowed, soon after, on Rufinus, the employment of Præfect of the Prætorium. The new honour, to which this favourite was raised, and the Emperor's protection, which he was sure of, gave him a more easy opportunity of revenging himself on his enemies. Promotus did not long survive this disgrace; for having received orders to go and join the army, and to march against the Bastarnæ who plundered Thrace, he was killed, by a party of those barbarians, in an ambuscade; on which occasion many charged Rufinus with being, treacherously, the cause of it. Proculus came to no less fatal an end †. Rufinus impeached him of several high crimes; bribed the Commissioners who were appointed to try him; forced them clandestinely to sentence him to death; and disposed matters so, that the pardon, which Theodosius sent him, did not arrive till after the execution. He had crossed Tatianus  in his domestick concerns; and Timasius would not have escaped better than the rest, had he not sued for his favourite's friendship, and shared in his crimes.

(1) Flechier, Hist. de Theodose, book 4. p. 434. ad ann. 391.

(2) Ibid. p. 435. ad ann. 392.

* Zos. l. 4.

† Zos. l. 4.

 Ambr. ep. 53.

[B] He was baptised with great pomp and ceremony in 394.] Flechier gives us a beautiful description of this, which is preceded by a passage that is a masterpiece in its kind, for which reason I shall give his words somewhat at length. " Rufinus, who go- " verned the Empire with absolute sway in Theodo- " sius's absence, . . . had for many years covered his " vanity and ambition with the specious appearances " of an affected modesty; and whether to ingratiate " himself the more with the Emperor, who loved " him, or to give less jealousy to the Courtiers who " envied his fortune, he grew every day more power- " ful, without appearing prouder. He secretly en- " deavoured to enrich himself; and though he was " naturally fond of splendor and noise, yet his co- " vetousness restrained his pride. But when he found " himself secure of his master's favour, and grown " very rich, either by his munificence, or by his " own rapacious and unjust conduct, he gave a loose " to his natural temper, and grew insolent, as soon " as he thought he could safely shew himself so " with impunity. He procured himself a great " number of creatures; appeared in publick with " a greater retinue than became a private man, " and raised palaces that were more splendid than " even those of the Emperors. He had been espe- " cially solicitous about building near one of the " suburbs of Chalcedon, called the Suburb of the " Oak *, a country seat, so vastly large, that it " looked like a town; and so richly adorned, and " furnished so magnificently, that one would have " concluded a private man could scarce be rich " enough to lay out such prodigious sums. On one " side was seen a great Church, in honour of the " Apostles St. Peter and Paul; and on the other ap- " peared at a distance, and standing on an adjacent " hill, a Monastery, which was to be a kind of nur- " sery to supply that Church with Ministers; as " soon as these buildings were finished, Rufinus re- " solved to be baptised; and to solemnize, at the " same time, with all imaginable pomp, the dedi- " cation of that new Church (3). . . . . With great " ostentation and pride, blended with a small pro- " portion of religion, he † summoned the Bishops " from all parts of the East, those especially who " possessed the principal Sees. He even besought, " by repeated letters, the most famous Anchorets of " Egypt to leave their solitude, and come and assist " in that famous ceremony. The rank he held in " the Empire, the chief direction of which he had " under Arcadius, prompted a great number of Bishops " to set out immediately upon their receiving this " invitation; bringing with them the most holy per- " sons in their several Provinces. The assembly was " very numerous. Nectarius of Constantine, Theo- " philus of Alexandria, and Flavianus of Antioch, " three Patriarchs: Gregory Bishop of Nyssa, Amphi- " lochus of Iconium, Paul of Heraclea, Dioscorus of " Helenopolis, and many more famous Prelates were " come thither first. The principal Nobility and " Clergy, and a numberless multitude of people re- " sorted thither; some to honour this Festival, others " to pay their Court to that favourite, and many to " satisfy their curiosity. This ceremony was per- " formed in September. The Church was hung with " rich tapestry, and the altar glittered with gold " and jewels. The consecration was performed with " the utmost order and magnificence. Divine ser- " vice being ended, they proceeded, with the like

* Zos. l. 3. c. 17.

(3) Flechier, Hist. de Theodose, book 4. p. 486. ad ann. 394.

† Theodoret. l. 1. c. 31. Socrat. l. 2. c. 5. Pallad. in Lausiac. c. 4.

vidence ; he being fully perſuaded of it, after the fall of ſo inſolent and unjuſt a favourite. I ſhall make ſome reflections on his words [C] ; and this will give me occaſion to

" pomp, to the baptiſm of Rufinus. He was made
" a Chriſtian by Nectarius the Patriarch ; and the " famous Evagrius of Pontus, who had been ſent
 Pallad. in Lauſiac. " for from Egypt with Ammonius the Anchoret, re" ceived, after the baptiſm was ended , this re-
" generated man, who did not long retain his inno" cence. Thus ended that ſolemnity, which would " have been one of the holieſt and moſt magnificent
" the Eaſtern Church ever ſaw, had it not been in" termixed with profane luxury; and had not this
" Stateſman attempted to get again from the people,
" by his unjuſt practices, the immenſe ſums which
" he ſeemed, on that occaſion, to have laid out in
(4) Flechier, Hiſt. de Theodoſe, book 4. p. 488. " the ſervice of God (4)."

[C] I ſhall make ſome reflections on Claudian's doubts (5).] He declares that the beautiful order, which is
(5) Relating to divine providence. ſeen in nature, prompted him to believe, that it is governed by the moſt wiſe laws of an infinite God ; but that the irregularities and diſorders which are found among mankind, the proſperity of the wicked, and the infelicity of the virtuous, prompted him to follow the hypotheſis of Epicurus, who ſuppoſed that all things were the effect of chance, and that the Gods did not concern themſelves with the government of the world. However, ſays he, the puniſhment of Rufinus has removed my doubts. I entirely abſolve the Gods. I no longer complain becauſe the wicked obtain ſo much power ; for they are raiſed with no other deſign, but in order that they may fall the lower. But it is better to hear Claudian himſelf.

Sæpe mihi dubiam traxit ſententia mentem,
Curarent Superi terras, an nullus ineſſet
Rector, & incerto fluerent mortalia caſu.
Nam cum diſpoſiti quæſiſſem fœdera mundi,
Præſcriptoſque maris fines, annique meatus,
Et lucis, noctiſque vices, tunc omnia rebar
Conſilio firmata Dei, qui lege moveri
Sidera, qui fruges diverſo tempore naſci,
Qui variam Phœben alieno juſſerit igne
Compleri, Solemque ſuo : porrexerit undis
Littora ; tellurem medio libraverit axe.
Sed cum res hominum tanta caligine volvi
Adſpicerem, lætoſque diu florere nocentes,
Vexarique pios : rurſus labefacta cadebat
Relligio, cauſſæque viam non ſponte ſequebar
Alterius, vacuo quæ currere ſemina motu
Affirmat, magnumque novas per inane figuras
Fortuna, non arte, regi : quæ Numina ſenſu
Ambiguo vel nulla putat, vel neſcia noſtri
Abſtulit hunc tandem Rufini pœna tumultum,
Abſolvitque Deos. Jam non ad culmina rerum
Injuſtos creviſſe queror, tolluntur in altum,
Ut lapſu graviore ruant (6).

(6) Claudian, in Rufin. lib. 1. init.

" Frequent my mind ſad doubts has entertain'd,
" Whether the Gods regard terreſtial things ;
" Or, (none preſiding) they, by chance, are hurl'd.
" For, when my eyes beheld this beauteous frame,
" And all things moving in ſuch glorious order ;
" The ſwelling ſea within its bounds reſtrain'd ;
" The various progreſs of the rolling year ;
" And the alternate change of day and night :
" I thence concluded, that a Deity
" Directed all with an almighty ſway.
" That he gave motion to the circling planets ;
" And bid the fruits in various ſeaſons riſe.
" Bid the fair moon with borrowed luſtre ſhine,
" And Phœbus glitter by his native rays.
" Bid the proud waves extend to every ſhore,
" And this round ball to hang on its own axis.
" But when I ſaw all human things involv'd
" In ſuch deep gloom ; the wicked flouriſh high,
" And good men groan beneath a load of woe :
" Religion's dictates ſoon forſook my boſom,
" And I the fam'd hypotheſis maintain'd,
" Which wildly fancies, that the ſeeds of things,
" Confus'dly hurl'd thro' the extended void,
" Not by amazing art, but chance, produc'd
" Th' unnumber'd worlds that compaſs us around :
" Which vainly thinks no deities exiſt,
" Or that they proudly diſregard vain mortals.
" But now, the puniſhment Rufinus met with,
" Has clear'd my anxious doubts, and juſtified
" Th' immortal Gods. I now no more complain
" To ſee the wicked rais'd to forune's ſummit :
" For ſuch are lifted to a greater height,
" Only to make their ſudden fall more dreadful."

I promiſed, in the Article of Marſhal d'Ancre (7), to mention here the reflections of Balzac on a thought of Malherbe, which is like that of Claudian, and will now be as good as my word. " (8) It is true that " men ſpoke in this manner, before they had been " better inſtructed by the Chriſtian Religion. The " Gods were accuſed of all the wicked actions com" mitted by men. Divine providence was daily im" peached, by ſome one or other who complained of " the things of this world, as not going as they " would have them. THIS FORTUNATE TY-
" RANT BEARS WITNESS AGAINST GOD, is
" an old ſaying mentioned by your Tully ; and no-
" thing is ſo common in the verſes of the heathen
" Poets, as the guilt of their gods, and of their fate :
" Crimen Deorum, Fatorum crimen, &c. Cynthia is " ſick ; and if her ſickneſs ſhould kill her, ſays the " Poet who was in love with her, the God of phyſic will " be the guilty cauſe of ſo great a beauty's death.

(7) See the art. CONCINI, rem. [F].

(8) Balzac, Socrate Chretien, p. m. 237.

" Tam formoſa tuum Mortua crimen erit.

" Nay, ſince the reign of Conſtantine, and under
" Theodoſius's ſon's, there are inſtances of this poeti-
" cal blaſphemy and profane liberty. If Rufinus had " not been puniſhed for his crimes, the gods would " have been impeached, as Rufinus's fautors and ac-
" complices.

" Abſtulit hunc tandem Rufini pœna timorem (9),
" Abſolvitque Deos.

(9) It ſhould be tumultum. Menage in his Obſer. ſur Malherbe, p. 431, did not take notice of this miſtake of Balzac, whoſe words he cites.

" One of our Poets has wrote ſomething like to this,
" but in a moſt excellent manner, and his copy exceeds
" all his originals. I offer it as a maſter-piece, in " the ode which may be put in parallel with the
" moſt beautiful and moſt finiſhed pieces of antiqui-
" ty. The God of the Seine addreſſes himſelf to a " favourite, who was going over the pont-neuf (new " bridge)." I ſhall not copy thoſe verſes of Mal-herbe, cited by Balzac ; the concluſion of them being tranſcribed in the remark [E] of the article CONCINI. To theſe words of Balzac I will add the following of Menage (10). By the way this thought,

(10) Menage, Obſervat. ſur Malherbe, p. 432.

And heav'n, accus'd of winking at thy crimes,
Is now reſolv'd to juſtify itſelf, was not hit upon originally by Claudian ; it being mentioned by ſeveral authors who lived long before him. Tully, in his de Natura deorum, book III: Diogenes quidem Cynicus dicere ſolebat, Harpalum, qui temporibus illis prædo felix habebatur, contra Deos teſtimonium dicere, quòd in illa fortuna tam diu viveret. And in another place in the ſame book, Improborum igitur proſperitates, ſecundæque res redarguunt, ut Diogenes dicebat, vim omnem Deorum ac poteſtatem, Martial :

Nullos eſſe Deos, inane cœlum
Affirmat Selius ; probatque, quòd ſe
Factum, dum negat hæc, videt beatum.

" Selius affirms, there are no Gods,
" But empty ſkies ; which well he proves,
" Since he, who ſays ſo, yet is happy.

Seneca ſays in this ſenſe, Deorum crimen, Sylla tam felix ; i. e. " The Gods are guilty in Sylla's being ſo
" happy ;" and an ancient Greek comic Poet,

Θεῦ δ' ὄνειδος, τοὺς κακοὺς εὐδαιμονεῖν.

" It is a reproach to God when villains flouriſh."

Barthius

to enquire, whether all thoſe who have maintained the orthodox opinion with regard to providence, (11) Barthius, ad Claudian. in Rufin. lib. 1. init. p. 1078, & ſeq.

(12) Apud Regem Prophetam Pſalm. 73 & 93. Hiobum cap. 23. Habacuc cap. 1. Maleachum, c. 3. Barthius, ibid. p. 1082.

(13) See rem. [H] of the art. PAYS.

(14) Plin. lib. 2. cap. 7. p. m. 145.

(15) See, on this ſubject, an obſervation againſt Coſtar, citat. 51, of the art. HERCULES.

Barthius (11) has collected a very great number of the like ſayings, and did not omit ſuch as are found in the Scriptures (12). We may bring under this head all thoſe paſſages of the ancients, in which fortune is exclaimed againſt, as a blind, inconſtant, vagabond, unjuſt being; as one who patronizes the worthleſs (13). One of theſe paſſages may ſerve here as a ſpecimen of the reſt, and it ſhall be borrowed from Pliny (14): Invenit inter has utraſque ſententias medium ſibi ipſa mortalitas numen, quo minus etiam plana de Deo conjectatio eſſet. Toto quippe mundo, & locis omnibus, omnibuſque horis omnium vocibus Fortuna ſola invocatur: una nominatur, una accuſatur, una agitur rea, una cogitatur, ſola laudatur, ſola arguitur, & cum convitiis colitur (15): volubilis, à pleriſque vero & cæca etiam exiſtimata, vaga, inconſtans, incerta, varia, indignorumque fautrix. Huic omnia expenſa, huic omnia feruntur accepta: & in tota ratione mortalium, ſola utramque paginam facit. Adeoque obnoxiæ ſumus ſortis, ut Sors ipſa pro Deo ſit, qua Deus probatur incertus. i. e. "Mankind have invented, between theſe two opinions, a medium, whereby the conjecture with regard to the exiſtence of a God is become more uncertain than before. For in every part of the world, in all places, and at all times, fortune alone is invoked by all perſons; is only named, accuſed, condemned, thought on, praiſed, cenſured, and adored with reproaches; fickle, and thought by moſt people to be blind; inconſtant, uncertain, various, and a fautor of the undeſerving. To her all things given and received are aſcribed; and ſhe is conſidered as all in all in human affairs. And we are ſo greatly ſubjected to chance, that chance itſelf is looked upon as a God, whereby the exiſtence of a God is made uncertain." It may be affirmed that, in all ages and in all nations, not excepting our age nor the Chriſtian world, the proſperity of the wicked has made people murmur againſt God, and occaſioned many doubts with regard to a Providence. On the other hand, this objection has been anſwered in all times and places; ſince therefore it has been perpetually revived, notwithſtanding all the replies made to it, we muſt conclude, that it has ſomething very ſpecious; and bears I know not what proportion to our underſtandings, which makes it eaſily return to our minds, though we ſhould attempt to drive it out in the moſt forcible manner (16). One would conclude, that what is beautifully ſaid of the palm-tree might be applied to it, curvata reſurgo (I riſe by oppreſſion); replies may indeed make me bend a little, but I immediately am reſtored to what I was before. The buſineſs is not to enquire whether it be ſolid, for we ought ot be firmly perſuaded that it is falſe, and inſignificant; but perhaps it may not be improper to enquire whether Claudian made a good anſwer to it.

(16) It is like nature, Naturam expellas furca, tamen uſque recurret. Horat. Epiſt. 10. lib. 1. ver. 24.

Conſiderations concerning the methods of anſwering the doubts with regard to a providence. Laws of diſputation.

Some perſons might ſay to him, you did not take a right courſe; the only anſwer you ought to have made to your difficulty was, to conſider the vaſt and immenſe idea of the ſupremely-perfect Being, and to draw the following conſequence from it; he is author of all things, he governs them all; nothing is therefore done but what is governed and conducted in an infinitely juſt, and infinitely admirable manner. This is doubtleſs the right way to remove all doubts; put reaſon to ſilence, and oblige it to ſubmit to authority (17); God ſaid it, αὐτὸς ἔφα; God has done it, God has permitted it; it is therefore true and juſt; wiſely done and wiſely permitted. If you will deſcend to particular reaſons, you will never extricate yourſelf; and after a thouſand diſputes, you will be forced to have recourſe to authority, and to the immenſe idea of the ſupremely perfect Being. But ſince we muſt come to it at laſt, let us keep, and adhere immoveably to it: let us lay our finger on our mouth, ſilence our imperfect knowledge; firmly perſuaded that, in ſuch things, the beſt uſe we can make of our reaſon is not to reaſon at all. Let us inforce more ſtrongly the motives of this method. When a perſon engages in a diſpute, he ought to affirm, that he will prove to his adverſary that he is in the wrong; but he muſt not affirm, that he will make him acquieſce in his firſt or ſecond anſwers.

(17) I was dumb, I opened not my mouth; becauſe thou didſt it. Pſalm xxxix. ver. 10.

The laws of this ſort of diſputations require, that each party reply to the other, ſo often as they can oppoſe argument to argument, and till the matter be brought to its firſt principles. If I can ſhew a man, that his poſition is repugnant to the common notions, and that mine is a natural and neceſſary conſequence of theſe notions, I may juſtly ceaſe to hear him, and ſilence him with the following axiom, that we ought not to diſpute againſt a man who denies the principles, Adverſus negantem principia non eſt diſputandum: but if I give only a probable ſolution to his difficulties, to which he may oppoſe new doubts, equally probable, or almoſt as probable, as thoſe of my ſolution, I have no reaſon to inſiſt upon his acquieſcing to my anſwers: I ought to ſearch for new ſolutions to his new difficulties; and if I do not find any evident ones, or ſuch as do not admit of a ſpecious reply, I ought to retire from the combat, without declaring myſelf victorious; for otherwiſe I ſhould imitate thoſe, who attempted to make converts of the Proteſtants in France. The Romaniſts in queſtion began about the year 1680, to offer to diſpute on religion with their miſtaken brethren, to inform and inſtruct them cordially; but after they had replied two or three times, they would no longer ſuffer themſelves to be contradicted; they would oblige thoſe whom they were converting, to ſubmit to their explanations, otherwiſe they declared that they were obſtinate. But it would have been much better, if they had ſaid this at firſt: it is ridiculous for a perſon to enter into diſcuſſions, if he will not permit his adverſaries to make an hundred replies, if he is able to do it, and if he is able to alledge againſt the tenth reply, an argument as probable, as the objection might be, which he propoſed to the main poſition or aſſertion. This is the true ſtate of diſputations. Your adverſary attacks your aſſertion; you reply; but your reply often lyes more open to difficulties than the poſition itſelf. You ought therefore to confute his reply. Your new anſwer contains I know not what, which raiſes new difficulties more plauſible than the firſt. They therefore muſt be examined, and ſo on in infinitum, unleſs you bring common notions (18) on your ſide, to confound your antagoniſt. Such are the laws of diſputation: if you do not intend to keep to them, you had better not enter the liſts, but ſay at once, this muſt be believed without entring into argument: God has ſaid ſo, that is ſufficient.

(18) I underſtand, by common notions, all the principles which the two contending parties are agreed upon.

But this would be an unjuſt way of diſputing, was the ſtate of the queſtion as follows; Has God ſpoke? but it would not be unjuſt, when we diſpute with perſons, who acknowledge the exiſtence of a ſupremely-perfect Being; and who ſuggeſt doubts to themſelves, upon pretence that the good are unhappy, and the wicked proſperous. The only anſwer, which ſhould be made to perſons who doubt thus, is this. You are perſuaded of the exiſtence of a ſupremely-perfect being or nature; you ought therefore to believe that it governs all things perfectly well; for if you did not draw this conſequence from the principle you admit, you muſt be ignorant of the firſt rules of common ſenſe, and you might as well argue thus; the ſun cannot produce darkneſs, and therefore he has produced it. To ſhew that we ought to keep to ſuch a ſhort anſwer, and this general principle of the exiſtence of God, I will ſhew the inconveniencies which ariſe from a diſcuſſion of particular reaſons. In the firſt place, it is certain that, in ſuch a caſe you are obliged to anſwer all the replies of your adverſary, till you can bring an argument to which no reaſonable reply can be made; and theſe are the laws of diſputation, as I obſerved above. Secondly; it is certain that your particular reaſons will be oppoſed in infinitum, by other reaſons full as ſpecious, at leaſt. I will here give a little ſpecimen of this. Our Poet would have alledged to another man, the ſame reaſon which removed all his doubts. He would have ſaid to him, ſince Rufinus was puniſhed, there is a providence which governs all things with wiſdom and juſtice. The proſperous condition of this wicked man did not prove that providence was aſleep, but on the contrary, that it had a more ſevere puniſhment

Providence, have well obſerved the rules of diſputation.

Naudæus aſſerts a very great falſity, viz. that Rufinus has been applauded by three or in ſtore for him: it lifted him up, in order that, precipitating from a greater height, he might have a worſe fall, and break all his bones

Tolluntur in altum,
Ut lapſu graviore ruant.

" For ſuch are lifted to a greater height,
" Only to make their ſudden fall more dreadful."

Claudian might have been anſwered; if this is all you know, the difficulty is as great as ever; though your ſolution be ever ſo ancient, this does not make it better. Juvenal had before ſaid of Sejanus:

Nam qui nimios optabat honores,
Et nimias poſcebat opes, numeroſa parabat
Excelſæ turris tabulata, unde altior eſſet
Caſus, & impulſæ præceps immane ruinæ (19).

(19) Juven. ſat. 10. ver. 104.

" For he who graſp'd the world's exhauſted ſtore,
" Yet never had enough, but wiſh'd for more,
" Rais'd a top-heavy tow'r of monſtrous height,
" Which mould'ring, cruſh'd him underneath the
" weight." DRYDEN.

Whilſt you ſolve one difficulty you raiſe another ſtill greater. Your particle UT ſtrikes with horror, and one cannot read it without trembling. You aſcribe to the moſt ſupremely-perfect Being, and conſequently infinitely good, a motive and a final cauſe, which, ſo far from containing the leaſt characteriſticks of goodneſs, are the moſt tyrannical and malicious that can be conceived. It is as if one of our Emperors, deſirous of putting to death ſome of his domeſticks, ſhould appoint new Governours of provinces; permit them there to exerciſe violence of every kind, and ſuck their marrow, as it were; it is, I ſay, as if he ſhould permit this, in order to puniſh them with the greater ſeverity. If Claudian had preſumed to advance the ſame with regard to Theodoſius as he did of God, viz. that he raiſed Rufinus to the higheſt employments, only to cruſh him with greater ſeverity, and, to ſhew his ſubjects the ſupreme power with which he could raiſe or depreſs, he would have ordered him to be hanged, as a ſatyrical Poet who had inſolently defamed him. Claudian would doubtleſs perceive the enormity of the particle UT, and of his final cauſe; and beg that his words might not be taken in a ſtrict and criminal ſenſe. He would ſay the deſign of Providence, in heaping up ſuch vaſt riches upon the infamous Rufinus, was not to inflict the heavier puniſhment upon him, but in hopes that this favourite would make a good uſe of it. He would add, that, according to the laws of nature, bodies would fall with the more violence, according to the height of the place from whence they fell; and conſequently that Rufinus's elevation would aggravate his puniſhment, when his continual abuſe of the heavenly favours called out for his being puniſhed. But this, would Claudian be anſwered, does not ſolve the difficulty; hope has nothing to do with the divine Being. God knows moſt certainly whatever ſhall come to paſs; he knew very certainly how much Rufinus would abuſe the favours indulged him by heaven. It therefore would have been better to have prevented, and reſtrained his hand, than wink'd at his crimes for many years, in order to inflict a puniſhment on him which cannot compenſate for the evil he has committed; the oppreſſion of ſo many innocent perſons, the death of ſuch multitudes, and the ruin of ſo many families (20). It is but a poor ſatisfaction for a province ruined by its Governor, for the people to be aſſured that he ſhall be puniſhed for it. It is ſtill as miſerable as before, whilſt the criminal finds his advantage in it.

(20) Cur omnium crudeliſſimus tamdiu Pinna reſervavit? At dedit pœnas. Prohiberi melius fuit, impedireque ne tot ſummos viros interficeret, quam aliquando pœnas dare. Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 3. cap. 32.

Exul ab octava Marius bibit, & fruitur Diis
Iratis: at tu victrix provincia ploras (21).

(21) Juven. ſat. 1. ver. 49.

" Marius
" Enjoys his exile; and, condemn'd in vain,
" Leaves thee, prevailing province, to complain.
DRYDEN.

I ſhall not carry farther the replies, which the Poet might make; I don't doubt but he might have a very large number of them; but then his adverſary would have as great a number, and be always like to thoſe which the Reader has ſeen; I mean, that they would be more proportionate than thoſe of Claudian to the notions of our minds, and to the ideas, according to which we judge of the perfection of a Government. I ſuppoſe that, after a long diſpute, his adverſary would ſay to him, I believe, as well as you, that whatever happened in the affair of Rufinus, is juſt, wiſe and perfect with reſpect to God; but it is not the force of your arguments that makes me believe ſo, for theſe are apt rather to raiſe doubts, than to calm the irreſolution of the mind. However, make uſe of them with regard to ſuch as will be paid in ſuch coin, but do not employ them to ſuch as carry arguments to a great length. The idea of the ſupremely perfect Being ought to ſuffice, and does ſuffice them, when they make right uſe of their reaſon. I knew ſome perſons, who had read over ſeveral times Boetius de Conſolatione Philoſophiæ, and were greatly ſurprized at the difference they always obſerved between that Author's objections and anſwers. Boetius was both an able Philoſopher and a very good man. Groaning under the weight of his dreadful misfortunes, and his ſoul being oppreſſed with grief, he ſuppoſes that Philoſophy comes to comfort him. He raiſes ſeveral objections to her with regard to Providence, and Philoſophy anſwers them as well as ſhe can; but whereas the difficulties raiſed by Boetius are adapted to perſons of the leaſt capacity, and pierce, with their ſtrong light, the dulleſt underſtandings, the ſolutions cannot be underſtood without the ſtrongeſt attention, and the utmoſt vivacity. Philoſophy cannot conceal her diffidence; ſhe is perpetually deſiring that ſhe may wind about, and to trace matters higher; and how juſt ſoever what ſhe ſays may be, we ſometimes are ſo unhappy as not to underſtand her; and though ſhe ſometimes convinces us, it is almoſt always without enlightening the mind. This is what ſome Readers of Boetius ſay. They obſerved to me, that a very ſubtile Profeſſor of the 17th century defended the honour of Philoſophy with greater dexterity than he did; for after introducing a heathen, who raiſes in his own mind a thouſand doubts with regard to Providence, he gives him no other expedient but the grace of the holy ſpirit (22).

(22) Unde Philoſophus noſter ethnicus tot difficultatibus oppreſſus, niſi afflatu divino animetur ad cognitionem Dei unius ac diſtincti ab univerſo nunquam aſſurget. Claudius Berigardus, in priores Libros Phyſ. Ariſtot. Circulo 20. in fine.

I muſt not conclude this remark, without obſerving the injuſtice of certain people, who fancy that ſuch as reject the reaſons they give for a doctrine reject the doctrine itſelf. But there is the utmoſt difference between theſe two things. Perſons of an equitable and judicious turn of mind will not fail to diſtinguiſh them; and permit others very patiently, and without entertaining the leaſt ſuſpicion, to oppoſe the raſhneſs of the orthodox, in the weak arguments they too often make uſe of to aſſert the truth. It is not but that many abuſes may be committed on this occaſion; for inſtance, the Scepticks, upon pretence of only combating the arguments of the Dogmatiſts with regard to the exiſtence of a God, did actually undermine the doctrine itſelf. They declared at firſt (23), that they followed the common opinion, without adhering to any particular ſect; that they owned there are Gods, that they honoured and aſcribed a providence to them; but that they could not bear to have the Dogmatiſts reaſon about them; after this they propoſed objections to them, which, by overthrowing Providence, tended to overthrow the exiſtence of a Deity. See Sextus Empiricus (24), who, inſtead of grounding his doubts, as Claudian does, on the proſperity of the wicked, grounds them on the adverſity and evil, with which the world abounds. He alledges or four famous Hiſtorians [D].

(23) Sext. Empiricus, Pyrrhon. Hypotyp. lib. 3. cap. 1.

(24) Idem, ibid.

alledges an argument which has been better told than refuted by Lactantius. See remark [E], citation (16), of the article PAULICIANS, and the following words of a Jeſuit, who obſerves that Arnobius owns this argument is unanſwerable. Poſſet denique cum Sexto Empirico, lib. 1. (it ſhould be ſaid the third.) Pyrrhonicarum hypotypoſeon, cap. 1. fieri tale argumentum, quòd ſi Deus ſit, cùm ſit bonus infinitè, & perfectiſſimus, nulla in mundo eſſet malitia aut imperfectio: nam contrarium unum infinitum deſtruit totaliter aliud. Cui argumento reſponſurus Arnobius, lib. 2. num. 49. poſt multam exaggerationem difficultatis, inſolubilem exiſtimare videtur. Alexander autem quem refert & latè rejicit Simplic. 2. cœli, in fine, concedit Deum non poſſe mala excludere, alioqui ea omnino fuiſſe prohibiturum. Et verò hoc ipſum argumentum multos Philoſophos vexaſſe, teſtatur Lactantius libro de ira Dei, cap. 13. Sed rectè reſpondet Scot, &c. (25).

(25) Theoph. Raynaud. Theolog. naturali, diſtinc. 5. num. 166. p. m. 532, 533.

[D] Naudæus aſſerts a very great falſity, viz. that Rufinus has been applauded by three or four famous Hiſtorians.] "Claudian inveighs ſtrongly againſt Ru-
" finus ..... who nevertheleſs is prodigiouſly ap-
" plauded by Zozimus, Zonaras, Eutropius, and Pau-
" lus Oroſius (26)." Theſe are Naudæus's words.

(26) Naudé, Dialog. de Maſcurat, p. 630.

If we take a view of theſe four Authors, it will ſoon appear that he is miſtaken. Oroſius (27) ſpeaks ill of Rufinus; and Eutropius ſays neither good nor ill of him; his hiſtory ending with the death of Jovian, who lived before Theodoſius. I do not find any thing in Zonaras's Annals relating to our Rufinus. The Rufinus ſpoken of by this Annaliſt (28), was Conſul of Rome at the ſame time that Pyrrhus made war with the Romans: and with regard to Zozimus, ſo far from his praiſing prodigiouſly Rufinus, he repreſents him as a wicked man. I could tranſcribe ſeveral paſſages in his hiſtory, which prove this evidently, but it will be ſufficient for me to copy the following. Ρυφῖνος μὲν οὖν, ἰδίᾳ τε πολλοῖς κακῶν ἀποφορήτων γενόμενος αἴτιος, καὶ τῇ πολιτείᾳ λυμηνάμενος ἁπάσῃ, δίκην ἔξετισε τῶν πεπεηρευμένων ἀξίαν (29). i. e. " But Rufinus, who, in his private character, had great" ly injured many, and done the utmoſt prejudice to " his country, met with the puniſhment due to his
" horrid crimes." We can ſcarce conceive how it was poſſible for Naudæus, who had read ſo much and had ſo ſtrong a memory, to commit ſo many faults in ſo few lines.

(27) See chap. 37. of book 7.

(28) Zonaras, Ann. lib. 8. p. 377, 379. edit. Paris 1686.

(29) Zozimus, lib. 5. p. 297. edit. Oxon. 1679.

RUGGERI (a) (COSMO), a Florentine, introduced himſelf at the Court of France as a great aſtrologer, at the time that Catharine de Medicis patronized thoſe people. He was a man of ſenſe, and looked upon as a ſcholar; beſides, he was bold even to impudence, whereby he inſinuated himſelf among the nobility, and was a great man at intrigue (b). Catharine de Medicis gave him the Abbey of St. Mahé in Lower Brittany. He had calculated the nativity of all the Noblemen of the Court; on which occaſion he gave them ſuch informations, as he thought would draw moſt money from them (c). He at laſt was looked upon as a ſoothſayer and magician; and in 1574 was involved in the proſecution of la Mole and Coconas [A], accuſed, among other crimes, of employing ſorcery, in order to kill King Charles IX. He is called Coſmo the Italian in that proſecution (d), the reſult of which, with regard to him, was, his being ſentenced to the gallies; but the Queen-mother releaſed him from them ſome time after (e). He perſuaded la Mole, and ſeveral others, that he could make waxen images, ſome of which would inſpire women with love; and others make any perſon they pleaſed die in a lingring condition.

(a) Balzac, Socrate Chretien, p. m. 253, calls hm Coſme Roger.

(b) Garaſſe, Doctrine Curieuſe, p. 155.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Mercure François, Tom. 4. p. 46. ad ann. 1615.

(e) See the rem. [A].

[A] He ... was involved in the proſecution of La Mole and Coconas.] Theſe were two favourites of Duke d'Alenzon, brother to Charles IX. who had prompted, or aſſiſted their Sovereign, in the commiſſion of ſome very criminal deſigns. I will take it for granted that they were charged falſely with ſome crimes; but they juſtly ſuffered death for ſuch as they were truly charged with. I will firſt quote Mezerai, and afterwards le Laboureur. In la Mole's houſe an image was found, which one Coſmo Rugier, a Florentine, and a great impoſtor, had made for him, to engage the affection of a Gentlewoman whom he was in love with. The Queen-mother would have had it thought, that it was made for the King. However, la Mole perſiſted always in denying it; notwithſtanding which he and Coconas loſt their heads. It is ſaid that two Princeſſes, who were in love with them, cauſed their heads to be ſtole away, and embalmed them in order to keep them. Another of their accomplices was broke upon the wheel, and Rugier ſent to the gallies: but the Queen-mother, who was extremely credulous in affairs of divination and ſorcery, took him out of that captivity, in order to make uſe of him (1). The Author, whom I am going to cite, informs us that the Queen-mother would have had Coſmo hanged, and does not aſcribe to her Majeſty the delivery of this galley-ſlave. I call him by this name, though I am ſenſible that he did not really tug at the oar. " Tourtai was ſentenced to be hang" ed, after having been put to the rack..... Be" ing aſked whether one Coſmo an Italian knew any " thing of the matter, he replied, that there is an " Italian, a black man, ugly faced, who plays on muſical
" inſtruments, wears ſometimes round, and ſometimes
" taffety breeches, and always dreſt in black; that this
" Italian is a luſty man, who is often at la Nocle's; but " whether he knows any thing of that attempt, he cannot
" ſay (2)." Le Laboureur explains this paſſage as follows (3). " This Italian is the Coſmo Rogieri I
" before ſpoke of (4), whom the Queen herſelf
" placed with the Duke her ſon, upon pretence of " teaching him Italian, but in reality to ſerve as a
" ſpy: upon the notice ſhe had received, or her be" ing afraid, that a party was forming, to ſet him
" on the throne, after the death of Charles IX. in" ſtead of the King of Poland his brother; and to " oppoſe his return to France. He afterwards con-
" feſſed to ſome one, that after he had communi-
" cated certain things to the Queen, he found that
" the party or faction would be ſo ſtrong, on ac" count of the hatred which the Paris maſſacre had
" raiſed in the minds of the people, and for the cruel
" temper which this Prince was ſuppoſed to have,
" not to mention that this would give the Govern" ment again into the hands of the Queen and the " Guiſes; that no longer doubting but it would
" ſucceed, becauſe of the mutual conſpiracy of the " great men, of the Secretaries of State, and ſeveral
" Members of Parliament, he reſolved to follow his " maſter's fortune. He was ſtill more firmly per" ſuaded of this, when after diſcovering to him the " ſecret converſations he had with the Queen, the " Duke truſted him with all his deſigns; and em" ployed him to amuſe his mother with ſome parti" culars of ſmall conſequence, by which he converſ-
" ed with her, and ſaw through her deſigns. By this " means he was deeply concerned in the affair; how" ever, the Queen having diſcovered the whole af" fair, cauſed him to be ſeized with the reſt, and " brought to a trial. But ſhe was not ſucceſsful in " this, he ſupporting, with great bravery, the uſual
" torture, upon more than fourſcore queſtions which " were put to him; and even upon many which he
" himſelf had diſcovered, without confeſſing any " thing relating either to the converſation, or the in-
" chanted medals which he was accuſed of making;
" one of King Charles, in order to bring him to his
" end, and the other for the Duke of Alenzon and la
" Mole his favourite, who wore them in their hats, in " order

(1) Mezerai, Abregé Chronolog. Tom. 5. p. 180. ad ann. 1574.

(2) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtelnau, Tom. 2. p. 408.

(3) Ibid.

(4) Viz. in p. 401, we read as follows: There are few criminals who would not ſuffer every kind of torture, if their lives depended on their confeſſion. This will appear from Coſmo Rogieri, whom I ſhall ſpeak of hereafter and who was known to be one of the chief perſons in the ſecret, and had been wanting in fidelity to the Queen, who had placed him, as a Spy, with the Duke her ſon.

dition (f). In 1604 he began to make almanacks, continued to make them for many years, and intermixed them with ſentences extracted from Latin Authors (g). He lived to a great age, and ſurvived all the Italian Courtiers of Catharine de Medicis (b). He died at Paris in 1615; and as he had declared publickly and inſolently that he would die an Atheiſt [B], his body was thrown in the fields. He had been accuſed, in 1598, of attempting to kill Henry IV. by witchcraft [C]; and being examined about it by Thuanus, was cleared. The relation I ſhall give (i) of that incident, will ſhew the inſolence [D].

(f) Mercure François, Tom. 4. p. 47.

(g) Ibid.

(b) Garaſſe, Doctrine Curieuſe, p. 155.

(i) In the remark [D].

" order to preſerve an inviolable friendſhip between " them; but which, in reality, was to ruin Mole, " who, on that vain aſſurance, ſet up for a mighty " man; but ſo far from meeting with any friends " in his misfortunes, his own maſter and this good " friend were witneſſes againſt him, as though our " flower-de-luces, ſent from Heaven as we are told, " had not received a virtue from Heaven, againſt " charms. If Coſmo gave any away, he kept a " very good one for himſelf, which preſerved him " from the gallows, and was very ſucceſsful againſt " his countrywoman the Queen. Catharine de Me- " dicis wanted to ſee him hanged, but he did not " care to come to that end; and the only ſatisfaction " ſhe had, was to ſee him chained, where he had no " other toil but the journey to Marſeilles. He there " got friends, who obliged the Captain of the gal- " ley to which he belonged, to lodge him in his " own houſe; and his houſe was never ſo much vi- " ſited, on his own account, as for that of this illuſ- " trious ſlave, who made it an academy for the ma- " thematicks and judicial aſtrology; having a keeper, " who ſeemed to be given him for honour ſake rather " than to watch him, and prevent his eſcaping." Thuanus affirms, that la Mole had an image of wax pricked in the heart; and that Ruggeri having been proſecuted as a magician, was ſet at liberty by the Queen-mother. I ſhall cite Thuanus's words in the remark [E], with la Mole's anſwers.

[B] He had declared publickly and inſolently that he would die an Atheiſt.] Here follows a paſſage from the Mercure François. He being reduced, by old age, the gout, and the gravel, to the confines of death, his friends adviſed him to apply his mind to God, and ſent for the Rector of the Pariſh, but he would not ſee him; upon which ſome Capuchins were brought to him, but he only laughed at them. And as he was deſired to prepare himſelf in ſuch a manner, as might enable him to obtain the favour of Heaven, and dread the laſt Judgment: ye fools, ſays he, begone: there are no Devils but thoſe which torment us in this world; nor any God, but Kings and Princes, who can raiſe and do us good (5). If the reader ſhould prefer the paraphraſe made by a Jeſuit to the ſimplicity of this relation, he may read what follows (6). " The gout and the gra- " vel . . . having, like two officers of death, ſeized " him as a perſon who did not pay his debts well, " conſumed him piece-meal; and nevertheleſs were " ſo kind to him, as to leave him his judgment " ſound, to repent of his ſins, if he would have taken " warning. Being in bed four days before he died, " he was viſited by the Rector of St. Medard, who " endeavoured to put him in mind of his duty, but " he would not hear him. Recourſe was then had " to the Capuchins, to ſee whether they could have " any good effect upon him. They came to ſee him " at the requeſt of ſome of his friends, and ſet before " him the ſeverity of God's judgments, and Satan's " malice and power, in this laſt ſtage of a man's life, " and therefore that he ought to think of his ſalva- " tion. Ruggeri, then ſpeaking, ſaid thus to them " with a voice of rage and deſpair, ye fools! leave " my chamber; and know that there are no other " devils in the world but our enemies, who afflict us " during our life; no other Gods but Kings and " Princes, who do us good: I have lived in this be- " lief, and in it I will die. They employed gentle " words and threats, in order to reform him, but all " to no purpoſe; he venting moſt horrid blaſphe- " mies, like Lucilio Vanini on the funeral pile, till " at laſt he ended his unhappy life like Judas, Infe- " licem ſpiritum non emiſit ſed amiſit, he did not pour " forth his wretched ſpirit, but loſt it. The report of " his deſpair was immediately ſpread over Paris; " the people loaded him with curſes, and his body " was thrown, as an example to others, into the " fields as unworthy of Chriſtian burial (7)."

(5) Merc. Franc. Tom. 4. p. 46.

(6) Garaſſe, Doctrine Curieuſe, p. 156, 157.

(7) Spizelius, in Scrutinio Atheiſmi, p. 130, ought not to have ranked him among ſuch Atheiſts as have been burnt alive.

[C] He had been accuſed, in 1598, of attempting to kill Henry IV. by witchcraft.] This monarch being in Nantz anno 1598, was informed that Coſmo Ruggeri was guilty of that crime. It was ſaid that this man, being at that time an Eccleſiaſtic, had a private cloſet in the caſtle of Nantz, in which he uſed to ſhut himſelf up daily upon pretence of painting; but that the real deſign was to prick, with a needle, an image that reſembled the King. He imagined, by this means, to reduce this Prince to a languiſhing condition, which would conſume him by inſenſible degrees. Coſmus Rugerius tunc ſacris addictus ad regem delatus fuerat, quaſi ipſius vitæ deteſtandis magiæ artibus perniciem molitus eſſet. Nam in arce Namnetenſi ſpecie pingendi cellam peculiarem habuiſſe, in qua ceream imaginem, quæ regis ſpeciem referebat, diris epodis excantatam cottidie acu figebat, eaque re fore ſpem fecerat, ut rex mox mortifero languore ſenſim abſumeretur (8). The King commanded Thuanus and another perſon, to inquire into that affair. Coſmus being interrogated juridically, immediately anſwered the objection made to him, grounded on his having been put to the torture for the like crime in 1574. He affirmed that it was calumny, with regard to him, on that occaſion, and that he was pronounced innocent by thoſe who then judged him. That his being ſuſpected to be a Magician by ſeveral perſons, who alſo accuſed him of it, was wholly owing to the particular ſkill he had in Aſtrology; it being imagined, that he could not have foretold ſo many things without the aſſiſtance of the Devil; though the truth was, he found them out by the exact knowledge he had of calculating nativities (9). He added, that the affection he had long entertained for his Majeſty juſtified him with regard to the crime he was accuſed of. He ſaid that, after the Paris-Maſſacre, the Court of France debated on what they ſhould do with the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Conde; and that Catharine de Medicis aſked him, if he had not calculated their nativity; that he anſwered he had; and that he thereby knew they would not occaſion the leaſt diſturbance in the Kingdom. He added, that this anſwer prevented the ill deſigns which were entertained againſt them; that he had revealed this affair to la Noue, and deſired him to give them notice of it; in order that, for the future, they might behave in ſuch a manner, as might confirm what he had told Catharine concerning them, merely out of affection for them; thoſe not being things which could be certainly diſcovered by Aſtrology (10). He concluded with ſaying, that he hoped his Majeſty, remembring the good ſervice he had done on that occaſion, would have much more regard to that, than to the malicious and ſlanderous accuſations of his enemies. Thuanus told all theſe ſeveral particulars to the King, who, after walking ſome time, remembered that la Noue had ſpoke to him about it at this time, and gave orders that Ruggeri ſhould be ſet at liberty, and the proſecution be ſuperſeded. The Ladies had before obtained a pardon for that wretch, who ſoon appeared at Court very familiar with them. Intermiſſa ulterior in Coſmum inquiſitio, & ipſe libertati reſtitutus fuit, & in arctam familiaritatem cum gynæceo venit, cujus favore à Rege, cum hæc diceret, jam gratia in arcano facta fuerat (11). Thuanus relates afterwards a particular, which muſt not be omitted. Ruggeri was ſo impudent as to affirm, that it was not himſelf, but a Gardiner of the ſame name, who was impeached and puniſhed at the ſame time with la Mole; and he impoſed upon them ſo far, that a penſion was ſettled upon him as Hiſtoriographer. Homo impudentiſſimus ac perditiſſimus poſtea auſus eſt palam dicere, quæ ad annum 73. de Coſmo Rugerio commemorantur, ad ſe minime pertinere, ſed Thu-

(8) Thuan. de Vita ſua, lib. 6. ad ann. 1598. p. 1234, col. 1, G.

(9) Ob id autem pleriſque ſuſpectum fuiſſe, quod Aſtrologiæ peritus certiorem ac ſibi cum paucis cognitam natalium horarum conficiendarum ſcientiam calleret, cujus ope ac ductu cum multa multis prædixiſſet, in eam veniſſe opinionem, quaſi occulta cum malis ſpiritibus familiaritate hæc didiciſſet. Idem, ibid.

(10) Id autem non tam ex arte, quam adfectu erga ipſos bene animato feciſſe, quippe cum res ejuſmodi eſſet, ut per aſtrologicæ artis rationem præſtari non poſſet. Idem, ibid, col. 2, A.

(11) Idem, ibid. B.

ſolence of this villain, and how greatly he was in favour with the Ladies. Many reflections might be made on his applying himſelf to aſtrology and magic, though he did not believe either God or Devil [D]; for it is a general opinion among Chriſtians that if anum olitoris cujuſdam cognominis tunc poſtulati errore allucinatum eſſe; eoque væſaniæ venit, ut emendicato ſtipendio in aula obtinuerit, ut ſcribendæ hiſtoriæ munus ſibi demandaretur (12). Admire the impudence of this fellow. The anſwers he made to the two Commiſſioners who examined him in Nantz were in being, ſigned by him; and he acknowledged that he was the ſame Coſmo Ruggeri, who had been ſlandered in the affair of la Mole; but Ruggeri affirmed that he had been honourably acquitted by the Judges. This laſt circumſtance alſo ſhews his impudence; it appearing, from the records of his trial, that he was ſentenced to the gallies. Iis (confeſſionibus) eundem ſe eſſe minime diffitetur, ſed per calumniam accuſatum, & poſtea honorifice, ſicuti jam dixi, dimiſſum; in quo rurſus inſigniter mentitus eſt, nam ex archivis Curiæ itidem conſtat, eum poſt quæſtionem ad triremes damnatum eſſe, ſed aulicorum in hoc hominum genus prono favore pœnam remiſſam fuiſſe, & cum duceretur, vinculis exemptum in aula ſtatim comparuiſſe (13). I'll alſo add what follows. When Ruggeri was examined in Nantz, he was told, that as judicial Aſtrology was an impious ſtudy, and unworthy of a Chriſtian, he was greatly in the wrong, being a Prieſt, to concern himſelf about it. Upon which he made the beſt excuſe he could; ſpoke even contemptuouſly of that ſcience; and ſwore, that from the time of his being in orders, he had not calculated a ſingle nativity (14).

(12) Thuan. de Vita ſua, lib. 6. ad ann. 1598. p. 1234. col. 2, B.

(13) Idem, ibid. C.

(14) Ipſe ſe quibus potuit verbis etiam elevata ea, excuſavit, & inter alia adjecit ac religioſe affirmavit ſe poſtquam ſacris addictus eſſet, quod diu poſtea fuit, nunquam natalem cujuſquam horas confeciſſe. Idem, ibid. D & E.

[D] His applying himſelf to aſtrology and magic, though he did not believe either God or devil.] Take particular notice of the confeſſion he made on his death-bed. There are no other devils, declared he (15), but the enemies who torment us in this world; nor any other god but kings and princes, who alone can advance us, and do us ſervice. He added, according to Garaſſe (16), in this belief I have lived, and in it I will die. If the Jeſuit added theſe words, I am of opinion that it may be juſtified by the laws of paraphraſe; for it may be looked upon almoſt as indiſputable, that every old man who dies an atheiſt, had been many years ſuch. Perſons do not grow irreligious on their death-beds, nor in the decline of life; on the contrary, moſt free-thinkers, libertines, unbelievers, &c. leave their impious notions in ſickneſs (17); and, in their dying moments, declare themſelves to be orthodox (18). We may therefore ſuppoſe with great probability, that our Ruggeri had been, for many years, the ſame man as he died. What then could he mean by calculating nativities, and thoſe images of wax he gave as cauſing love and hatred? Theſe things agree ill together; all thoſe, who ſpeak of his end, make the following reflection upon it. He had formerly made people believe, that he knew how to make images, &c. and YET that atheiſt did not believe there were devils (19). The wiſeſt men at that time (20) were of opinion, that he was not ſkilled in necromancy, and INDEED THE END he made ſhewed it clearly (21). It is certain that, as he did not believe the exiſtence of any ſpirit diſtinct from the ſoul of man, he muſt neceſſarily look upon all that was related concerning magic as fabulous: conſequently, it was merely to get money, that he pretended to make images which ſhould have the power to kill, or inſpire with love. He himſelf knew the vanity of his promiſes, and that his pricking the images with a needle were of no effect. It is not ſo certain that he was ſenſible of the vanity of aſtrology; a perſon of genius and learning is perfectly ſenſible, that a piece of wax worked up into the ſhape of a man, or woman, and pricked in the heart, is not capable of producing, in a perſon at a diſtance, either a deſire of marrying ſuch a perſon, or any other kind of paſſion. He knows evidently that a piece of wax repreſenting Henry IV, and which is put near the fire in Nantz, or is pricked in different parts in the ſame city, has not the power of infecting that monarch with a ſlow and mortal fever in Paris. And therefore every man of genius, ſenſe and learning, who is perſuaded that theſe waxen images have the virtue in queſtion, know moſt certainly, that their effects are produced by an inviſible ſpirit, which acts immediately and phyſically on certain perſons, whilſt thoſe images are in certain circumſtances. Since therefore Ruggeri did not acknowledge any ſuch ſpirit, he plainly knew that thoſe images had no virtue of any kind. But it does not appear as evidently, that celeſtial bodies are incapable of producing a numberleſs multitude of effects on earth. It is known that perſons who were looked upon as atheiſts, have been firmly perſuaded of the efficacy of the influence of the ſtars, even with regard to the free actions of men, and what we call fortune, or contingent events. We therefore are not certain that Ruggeri knew the vanity of judicial aſtrology. I believe, however, that it would not be very raſh to aſſert, conſidering the turn of Ruggeri's mind (22), that he only calculated nativities after the manner of cheats, without giving any credit to them, and only to get money.

(15) Merc. Franc. Tom. 4. p. 46.

(16) Garaſſe, Doct. Curieuſe, p. 157.

(17) See rem. [E] of the art. BION, the Boriſthenite.

(18) That is, orthodox with regard to the providence of God, of Heaven and Hell.

(19) Mercure Franc. Tom. 4. p. 47. See alſo Thuanus's Continuator, book 8. p. 537.

(20) That is, at the time la Mole was beheaded.

(21) Garaſſe, Doct. Curieuſe, p. 155.

(22) The reader may have ſeen in the preceding page, citat. 10, that he affirmed that the horoſcope of the King of Navarre, and that of the Prince of Conde, promiſed that they would not make any commotions; and yet he did not learn this from Aſtrology.

It will perhaps be objected to me, that it is as difficult to conceive that a certain ſtar, ſituated in a certain manner in the ſcheme of a perſon's nativity, is a phyſical cauſe of the gracious reception a man of fifty years of age meets with from a Prince, who ſalutes him at ſuch an hour, as to be perſuaded that images of wax, pricked in the heart, can raiſe the paſſion of love in a perſon, at an hundred leagues diſtance. I anſwer, that there are great numbers of perſons, who look upon this effect of the planet quite as chimerical as the effect of the image, and I myſelf am one of thoſe. But I repeat it again; a perſon may be more eaſily deceived with reſpect to the power of the planets, than with regard to that of waxen images. No perſon can inſtance to me one man of learning, who imagined that theſe figures, by their own power, and without the interpoſition of any ſpirit, inſpire with love, or kill, at an hundred leagues diſtance; but ſome learned perſons may be inſtanced, who imagined that, without the aſſiſtance of good or bad angels, the planets in a man's horoſcope, are the cauſe of his moſt fortuitous adventures. We conceive very clearly, that a piece of wax, pricked at Nantz, heated and ſhaped at pleaſure, cannot be the phyſical cauſe of any thing in Rome; but experience teaches us, that the ſun's virtue produces a thouſand things phyſically, and as a true cauſe on the earth. Hence people are led into error; and fancy that the reſt of the ſtars extend alſo their operations to the earth; which, being admitted, will carry a perſon a great way by inſenſible degrees; ſo that they, at laſt, conſider them as the cauſe of all things.

That if judicial Aſtrology diſcovered things to come, it would be a kind of black art or magic.

I muſt obſerve by the way, that this is an illuſion or error, which ought to be more ſeverely checked than it is; for were it true for inſtance, that by horoſcopes one might fortel the happineſs or infelicity of people, the circumſtance of their marriage and death, &c. were it true, for inſtance, that Gauricus, in an aſtrological operation, diſcovered that King Henry II would be killed in a duel; aſtrology muſt in that caſe be ranked in the number of the magical arts, and of thoſe kinds of divination which are grounded on a compact with the devil. The pains aſtrologers take to calculate a nativity, and to conſult the rules eſtabliſhed by them with regard to the diſtinctions of ſigns, the properties of the houſes, the different aſpects of the planets &c. their pains, I ſay, in this reſpect, would be like that which magicians take in drawing circles, making ſeveral poſtures, uttering certain words &c (13). What a man would do on either ſide, would only be an eſtabliſhed or appointed ſign, upon making whereof a wicked angel would act after a certain manner. It is plain, when we attend to it, without prejudice, that magical ceremonies, a circle, a bow, a wand, pointed ſucceſſively to the four cardinal points of the horizon; certain words uttered, certain words written on pieces of paper &c. are not more incapable of curing a man dangerouſly ſick, or killing a man in good health, than horoſcopes are incapable of diſcovering whether a man ſhall be happily married; whether he ſhall be loved by his Prince; ſhall be ſent into baniſhment; whether his

(23) See a long deſcription of the ceremonies of magic, in letter 12 of Cyrano de Bergerac.

if there are Devils, there is a God; and that thoſe who do not believe the exiſtence of a God, wealth will conſiſt in lands or money; whether he will die at ſea, or at the ſiege of a city. This ſhews that an aſtrologer ought to be puniſhed the more, as his horoſcopes would more ſurely diſcover the truth of futurity; for the certainty of his predictions would be a ſign, that he punctually performed thoſe ceremonies, in preſence of which the devils had eſtabliſhed, by their original compact, to reveal futurity. This alſo proves that judicial aſtrology cannot be a way of fortelling things to come different from that of a ſieve, a glaſs, ſmoke, and an hundred more abominable practices (24); whence I conclude, that the indulgence, which ſpiritual and ſecular Courts ſhew with regard to judicial aſtrologers, is highly criminal. Very good laws, both civil and canonical, have been enacted againſt them; all which have been diligently collected by a profeſſor of Padua, in a work publiſhed by him at Venice in 1662 (25); but then they are not put in execution. John Baptiſt Morin, regius profeſſor at Paris, enjoyed undiſturbed his penſions and employments till his death, though he calculated nativities in publick, and openly profeſſed that he had a wonderful talent at them (26)? But had he been ſo bold as to aſſert, that relicks ought not to be worſhipped, he would have been removed immediately from his employments; he would have been driven away in the moſt ſhameful manner; and had any powerful perſons preſumed to protect him, all the Clergy would have roſe up, and not have ceaſed their clamours till the impious wretch had been turned out of his places. What a partiality is this to errors! He was permitted to practiſe, with impunity, an art, all his life-time, which in the main muſt be magic, if there is a way of diſcovering futurity. Pleaſe to obſerve, that it is difficult to comprehend how this can be found out by the aſſiſtance of the devil; for how vaſt ſoever we ſuppoſe the knowledge of the angels to be, it does not ſeem to include the concatenation of all objects which muſt be known, to ſay certainly that ſuch and ſuch things will come to paſs; and it would be abſurd to ſay, that God reveals it to them every time they will execute the horrid compact they had made with man. Abbé Furetiere exhibits this objection in a very clear manner (27), but he omits the moſt eſſential one. He does not ſay, that man's free-will would be a mere chimæra, in caſe angels could divine what a man will think ten years hence; could he, I ſay, divine it by the knowledge of the connexion, which is between natural cauſes and their effects.

(24) See the alphabetical catalogue of theſe, in chap. 35. of a book printed at Paris, and afterwards in Holland, in 1692, entitled, Remarques ou Reflexions Critiques, Morales, & Hiſtoriques, ſur les plus belles & agreables Penſees.. des Anciens & des Modernes. I believe the Author borrowed all this from Martin Delrio's book.

(25) Don Joſeph Maria Maravigliа, Clerk regular, in his Pſeudomantia veterum & recentiorum exploſa, ſive de fide Divinationibus adhibenda.

(26) See the art. of this MORIN.

(27) See the Furetieriana, p. 109 & ſeq. Bruſſels edit.

Whether it follows, that becauſe Devils exiſt, there muſt be a God.

Nothing would be more abſurd than to aſk, whether it be poſſible that Ruggeri, believing neither God nor good nor bad angels, imagined that the waxen images in queſtion could have any efficacy or power; but it would not be an abſurdity to put this queſtion to all atheiſts. It is generally thought, that every perſon, who denies the exiſtence of God, denies alſo, by a neceſſary conſequence, the exiſtence of all ſpirits, and the immortality of the ſoul. I am not ſurprized that this ſhould be a common opinion; for I believe we have no example of theſe blaſphemies being ſeparated (38); I mean, either that there ever were Atheiſts, who believed the exiſtence of Devils, and the immortality of the ſoul; or that there ever was a man who believed the reality of magic, and yet did not believe the exiſtence of a God. We meet with ſome Chriſtians, who, tho' orthodox in all other reſpects, cannot perſuade themſelves that bad Angels concern themſelves with any thing; and who abſolutely reject whatever is ſaid concerning magic and ſorcery. If theſe contented themſelves with ſaying, that the Scriptures only can prove the exiſtence and operation of wicked Angels, we ſhould not wonder at their opinion; for it is certain that reaſon ſuggeſts very powerful objections againſt the Devil's empire, grounded on the notions we entertain of the wiſdom and goodneſs of God: but it is great raſhneſs, to ſay no worſe of it, in thoſe, who ſay the Devil has no power, to reconcile their opinion with Scripture. However this be, the following conſequence is falſe and unjuſt. You do not believe the exiſtence of Devils, and therefore you do not believe the exiſtence of a God. With regard to this other conſequence, you do not believe the exiſtence of a God; conſequently you do not believe the exiſtence of good or bad Angels, this conſequence ſeems very certain; for as I obſerved above, we do not meet with one inſtance to diſprove it. Here follows another conſequence that ſeems to be certain: Devils exiſt, and conſequently a God exiſts. We are ſo firmly perſuaded of the juſtneſs and neceſſity of ſuch a concluſion, that we immediately affirm, that ſuch as deny the exiſtence of Demons, deprive the orthodox of an indiſputable proof of the exiſtence of God. I confeſs I have not yet met with any perſon, who ſeemed to me fully perſuaded, that the exiſtence of the Devil proves neceſſarily and invincibly that God exiſts; and we do not meet with one man, who doubts ever ſo little this laſt truth (29), but abſolutely denies that there are Angels. I will nevertheleſs confeſs, that I have not underſtanding enough, to ſee the ſtrong connexion which every one finds between theſe two Theſes, Devils exiſt; conſequently there is a God. To lay aſide Scripture, and argue only from metaphyſical principles, may it not be aſſerted, that God created no other ſpirits but the ſoul of man? If it ſhould be aſked, why ſo powerful a Being did not give exiſtence to other ſpirits, it will be anſwered, that he did not think fit to do it. He produced or created all things with a ſupreme liberty, more of one kind of Beings, and fewer of another; he being always guided by no other rule, but his infinitely wiſe will. What objection can be made to ſuch a reaſon? If you ſpeak to an Atheiſt, and aſk him why he denies the exiſtence of Demons, his anſwer will be quite trifling; and if you puſh him home, he will ſoon be put to ſilence. Will he dare to ſay, that the univerſe being infinitely eternal, the ſupremely perfect Being, which exiſts neceſſarily, contains nothing that exceeds man in underſtanding and knowledge? What! becauſe a man has two eyes, a noſe, a mouth, a brain, nerves and veins, he therefore muſt poſſeſs all the knowledge and induſtry in nature? Muſt there be no will, no underſtanding, no paſſions, or art of applying bodies one to the other, any where elſe? If you could ſhew, that a free agent thought proper to indue with knowledge ſuch creatures only as have a brain, you would put me to a ſtand; but you acknowledge no ſuch cauſe. According to your principles, all things exiſt neceſſarily; you therefore cannot tell me, why impalpable matter ſhould be leſs ingenious than that which we call fleſh and blood, man, beaſt, &c. And if you reaſon juſtly, you ought to believe, that ſince the infinite Being thinks in man, he thinks every where elſe; and that if there are on earth ſeveral living bodies which love or hate one another, and ſome of whom oppreſs one another, there alſo are, in the air and elſewhere, ſome compounded beings which love man, and others that hate him, which have more wit and power than man. Here we have good and bad angels. In a word, ſince an atheiſt cannot deny but that there are wicked, envious and revengeful beings (30), which take a pleaſure in the evils of others, which, by the application of bodies produce ſtrange changes in nature, conformably to their paſſions; it would be ridiculous in him, ſhould he preſume to deny, that, beſides thoſe wicked beings which are the object of his ſight, there are many others unſeen by him, and ſtill more malicious and ſkilful than man. We therefore may ſay, that if the univerſe was not God's work, it would neceſſarily contain bad angels, in like manner as it contains wolves and men; but if it be the work of God, it is no ways neceſſary that it ſhould contain ſuch and ſuch things; and conſequently the exiſtence of devils is not ſo ſtrong a proof, as might be imagined, of the exiſtence of God; but is more proper to ſtrengthen the Manichee ſyſtem (31) than to ſupport the orthodox faith. I propoſe this only as a doubt to be diſcuſſed.

(28) See hereafter, in this art. the reſtriction which is put to this, ſpeaking of Eaſterns.

(29) That is, with regard to the exiſtence of a God.

(30) By theſe Beings mankind are meant.

In this manner it would be poſſible, though it is very probable no ſuch thing ever happened, for perſons as atheiſtical, in certain reſpects, as Ruggeri, nevertheleſs to believe that images of wax, by the help of certain ceremonies, ſhould produce love or hatred

(31) Becker ſtrongly reproaches Divines with introducing Manicheiſm, by the empire they aſcribe to Devils. But he ought not to reproach them with this, ſince they ground their opinion on the ſcriptures. I here conſider things only in a philoſophical light.

a God, do not believe there are Devils. I ſhall take ſome notice of that opinion, and point out Father Garaſſe's errors [E].

RUSH-

hatred at an hundred leagues diſtance. They would conſider theſe ceremonies only as the ſign of a compact, which ſhould determine a devil to produce certain effects, by the application of bodies whoſe force would be known to him.

Reflection on the religion of the Eaſterns.

I muſt deſire my readers to take notice, that I hitherto have only conſidered the knowledge we have of the opinions of the ancient heathens, and thoſe of the modern Europeans; for I will confeſs that what is related concerning the Religion of the Eaſterns, does not permit me to uſe the general expreſſions I employed. It is affirmed (32) that the inhabitants of Siam do not acknowledge any Deity; and that they nevertheleſs (33) believe the return and apparition of ſpirits; that they are afraid of the dead, and practiſe certain ceremonies to appeaſe them (34). Beſides, they offer up, on almoſt all occaſions, prayers to good genius's, and imprecations againſt bad ones. Theſe people are in a fair way of becoming magicians, without believing the exiſtence of a Deity. The relation (35) I cited juſt now adds, that the modern Indians believe, as the ancient Chineſe, that there are good and bad ſouls every where; on whom they have beſtowed, as it were, divine omnipotence. This means, that they do not recognize any ſupreme God, but a numberleſs multitude of good and bad genius's; conſequently they may be atheiſts and magicians at the ſame time. The notions of the learned men in that country are ſomething more like thoſe of the Europeans; for if, on the one hand, they are atheiſts, they deny, on the other, the exiſtence of ſpirits, and the immortality of the ſoul. It is affirmed, in ſeveral relations of China, that learned perſons, who, in that country, are the moſt conſiderable men, conſider the ceremonies made at funerals only as ſo many duties of civil life, at which they uſe no prayers; that they have not, at this time, any ſenſe of Religion, and do not believe the exiſtence of any God, nor the immortality of the ſoul; and that though they ſtill pay to Confucius an outward worſhip, in the temples dedicated to him, they yet do not beg of him the learning which the Litterati of Tonquin beſeech him to beſtow upon them (36). This exterior worſhip of Confucius is therefore only grimace in them; and they conform to it only out of policy. Read the following paſſage, and we ſhall find they not only deny a ſupreme intelligence, but likewiſe inferior beings endowed with intelligence. The men of letters, that is thoſe who have taken ſome degree in literature, and who are the only perſons that are concerned in the government, became, by inſenſible degrees, totally impious; and though they have made no alteration in the ſtyle and language of their predeceſſors, they yet have changed the ſoul of the heavens, and that of all other ſouls, into I know not what aerial ſubſtances, devoid of underſtanding; and have ſet up, as the only judge of our works, a blind fate, which, in their opinion, performs all that almighty and omniſcient juſtice could do (37).

(32) La Loubere, Relation de Siam, Tom. 1. chap. 22. num. 6. p. m. 501.

(33) Ibid. chap. 20. num. 20. p. 481.

(34) Ibid.

(35) Ibid. chap. 23. num. 8. p. 508.

(36) Ibid. chap. 20. num. 4. p. 467, 470.

(37) Ibid. chap. 23. num 14. p. 514. Compare t his with citat. 55, of the art. MALHERBE.

[E] I ſhall . . . . point out father Garaſſe's errors.] I. He ſays (38) that about a fortnight before the deceaſe of Coſmo Ruggeri, in 1615, a little book was diſperſed about Paris, and entitled, The dreadful hiſtory of two conjurers ſtrangled by the devil in paſſion week (39). But we are aſſured in the Mercure François (40), that Ruggeri's death gave occaſion to that book. There is no doubt but that the author of this Mercure is more accurate and worthy of credit than the author of Doctrine curieuſe; and conſequently all the moral reflections of the latter, grounded on previous reports, fall to the ground. I muſt not omit the following paſſage in the Mercure (41): The firſt of thoſe two magicians was that impudent cheat Cæſar, who drew money from all the inquiſitive of his age, either to ſhew them devils, or direct them to treaſures, and afterwards laughed at them. It was reported that he was ſtrangled by his devil, and nevertheleſs he is ſtill living in the Baſtile. The ſecond was this Abbot of St. Mahé. II. Garaſſe goes on as follows (42). In MDLXXIV, la Mole and Caconas (43), having been condemned by the ſentence of the Court, as guilty of ſorcery and inchantments, on occaſion of the death of King Charles IX, Coſmo Ruggeri was accuſed at the ſame time, as having aſſiſted them by his magical arts. La Mole and Coconas were executed in the life-time of Charles IX, and conſequently this was not on occaſion of his death. It does not appear that their ſorcery was levelled at that King's death, and it cannot be ſaid that they were convicted of it. Here follows the ſubſtance of the anſwers made by la Mole when upon the rack. Being told, that he had, in his houſe, ſome waxen images, having two holes in their heads; he anſwered that he had not. Being aſked concerning the image of wax which was ſaid to be found in his houſe; ah! my good God, ſays he, I deſire to die, if I made any waxen image for the King. Being aſked with regard to the golden figures in his hat, he replied, that he knew nothing about them. Being again faſtned to the buckles and rings, he ſaid, that he knew no more than what he had revealed. The little treſtle being again brought in, and he admoniſhed to ſpeak truth, ſaid, Gentlemen, I know nothing more, upon the damnation of my ſoul; I know nothing before the living God, on my damnation. True God eternal, my God, I know not whether the image of wax was made for the King or Queen. Being aſked, where the ſaid waxen image is, and whether Coſmo carried it to him; he ſaid, that this image was made for a woman, whom he was deſirous of marrying, his country-woman; and if it be ſhewn, it will appear to be in the form of a woman; that the ſaid Coſmo has the ſaid image; that the ſaid image has two thruſts in the heart, and that he will ſhew it ſuch. Being aſked concerning the King's ſickneſs, he replied, may I die, if poor la Mole ever harboured any thought about it; and I deſire that Coſmo may be ſent for, who will ſay it is nothing elſe. Being interrogated where the ſaid waxen image is, he anſwered, that Coſmo has it; that it was made for a woman, and that he did not deſire Coſmo to do any thing elſe; and that the ſaid Coſmo gave it thoſe thruſts in the heart. Being asked why he thruſt it ſo in the heart, he replied that he could not tell. Water being brought in, he deſires that it may be taken away, and he will tell the truth. Being brought before the fire, and admoniſhed to tell the truth with regard to that waxen image, he ſaid, I deny my God, and may he damn me eternally, if it was for any other purpoſe than what I ſaid (44). Here follows the ſubſtance of the confeſſions extorted from Coconas by the torture. Being queſtioned with regard to the waxen image, he ſaid that he knew nothing of it; and that Coſmo and la Mole were vaſtly intimate. Being aſked whether he knows of any pictures or characters made againſt the King, he replied, that he did not; and that he ſpoke about it to a Captain of this town, who told him that they had broke all la Mole's rings; and that he aſked the ſaid Captain, whether they had broke a ring as big as one's finger; and that if there was any thing, it would be found there. He ſaid farther, that with regard to any attempt upon the King's perſon, he had never heard of any ſuch thing. Being queſtioned whether he knew any thing of the waxen image, he replied in the negative; and that if any one knew ſomething of it, it muſt be Coſmo (45). Thuanus declares, that la Mole proteſted that this image of wax was intended only to inſpire a woman with love. Tortus Mola & interrogatus de imaguncula cerea, quam magicis præſtigiis ab ipſo confictam, & acu in corde tactam conſtabat, quem in rei uſum id faceret, & cujus opera ad id uteretur; reſpondit, ut puellam quandam in Provincia, quam efflictim deperiebat, hac arte ad mutuo ſe redamandum accenderet, id feciſſe; eaque in re uſum opera Coſmi Rugerii Florentini, qui mox comprehenſus & tanquam maleficus omnino raſus, Reginæ favore, quæ illius & hujuſmodi hominum opera perfamiliariter utebatur, periculo exemptus eſt (46). III. Garaſſe is not accurate in the following paſſage. "This man eſcaping this danger "by his miſtreſs's favour, let himſelf be ſeduced by "the wretched deſire he had of being looked upon "as a great judicial Aſtrologer, and wonderfully "well ſkilled in that art; ſo that he promiſed waxen "images to all the curious debauchees, to inſpire "hearts with love or hatred: and as both theſe paſſions are equally ſilly, he had more cuſtom at Pa"ris, than if he had promiſed to give pardons or "plenary indulgences (47)." Here we have an Author, who, in order to prove that Coſmo deſired to be reputed extremely well ſkilled in judicial Aſtrology,

(38) Garaſſe, Doct. Curieuſe, book 2. ſect. 8. p. 155.

(39) Ibid. p. 154. See alſo Thuanus's Continuator, book 8. p. 537.

(40) Tom. 4. p. 47.

(41) Ibid.

(42) Garaſſe, Doct. Curieuſe, p. 155.

(43) It ſhould be Coconas.

(44) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtelnau, Tom. 2. p. 411.

(45) Ibid. p. 412, 413.

(46) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. 57. p. 64. col. 1, A. See d'Aubigné, who here, as in an hundred other places, has only abridged Thuanus. See d'Aubigné, Hiſt. Univerſelle, Tom. 2. lib. 2. cap. 6. p. m. 688.

(47) Garaſſe, p. 156.

☞ RUSHWORTH (JOHN), famous for his Hiſtorical Collections [A], was deſcended of a good family in Northumberland, and born about the year 1607. He ſtudied for ſome time in the Univerſity of Oxford in the latter end of the reign of King James I. but left it without being matriculated, and retiring to London, entered himſelf a ſtudent in Lincoln's-Inn, of which he afterwards became a Barriſter. But his genius leading him more to State-Affairs than the Common Law, he began early to take down in characters, ſpeeches, and paſſages, at conferences in Parliament, and from the King's own mouth what he ſpoke to both Houſes; and was continually an eye and an ear-witneſs of the greateſt tranſactions. He perſonally attended and obſerved all occurrences of moment, during the eleven years interval of Parliament, in the Star-Chamber, Court of Honour, and Exchequer-Chamber, when all the Judges of England met there upon extraordinary caſes; and at the Council Table, when great cauſes were tried before the King and Council. Afterwards when matters were agitated at a great diſtance, he was there alſo, and went on purpoſe, out of curioſity, to obſerve the paſſages at the Camp at Berwick, at the fight at Newborne upon Tyne with the Scots, at the Treaty of Rippon, and at the great Council at York in 1640. Upon the opening of the long Parliament, November the 3d the ſame year, he was choſen aſſiſtant to Mr. Henry Elſyng, Clerk of the Houſe of Commons, who ſent by him their addreſſes to the King, when his Majeſty was at York; and upon theſe occaſions Mr. Ruſhworth rode with ſuch expedition between London and York, which is 150 miles, that he ſeveral times performed the journey in 24 hours. In 1643 he took the Covenant, and being nearly related to Sir Tho. Fairfax (for his father and mother were natives of Yorkſhire of ancient extract) he was appointed Secretary to him, as General of the Parliament's Forces. In 1649 he attended that General with ſeveral Officers of note to the Univerſity of Oxford, where he was created Maſter of Arts; and at the ſame time, as a Member of Queen's College, was made one of the Delegates to take into conſideration the affairs then depending between the citizens of Oxford, and Members of the ſaid Univerſity. After Fairfax had reſigned his Commiſſion, Mr. Ruſhworth reſided in Lincoln's-Inn; and in Jan. 1651 was appointed one of the Committee to conſult about the Reformation of the Common Law. In 1658 he was choſen a Burgeſs for Berwick upon Tweed to ſerve in the Parliament, which began at Weſtminſter January the 27th the ſame year; and again for the ſame place in that Parliament, which began April the 25th 1660. In September 1667, upon Sir Orlando Bridgman's being made Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, he was appointed his Lordſhip's Secretary, and continued ſo as long as his Lordſhip held that office. He was elected Burgeſs for Berwick upon Tweed in the Parliament, which began March the 6th 1678, and in that which began October the 17th 1679, and in that which met at Oxford; after the diſſolution of which laſt Parliament he lived obſcurely in Weſtminſter, till he was committed priſoner for debt to the King's Bench in Southwark, where he ſpent the laſt ſix years of his life, and died May the 12th 1690, aged eighty three years, and logy, ſays, that he promiſed waxen images. Now theſe images have always been conſidered, either as effects or fooleries of Magic, and do not relate in any manner to judicial Aſtrology. They are not looked upon as Taliſmans; the manner how, it is ſaid, they muſt be uſed, ſhew manifeſtly that their virtues, whether true or falſe, do not depend on the conſtellations. We are told that they muſt be pricked with needles; muſt be heated at a ſlow fire, &c. which occaſions great alterations in the perſons who are the objects of ſuch practices. This cannot be natural; the influence of the ſtars cannot produce ſuch effects; it is the black art, the work of the devil. The Heathens aſcribed this practice to none but Witches.

(48) Ovid, ſpeaking of Medea, in Epiſt. Hypſip. ad Jaſon. See Frommann, de Faſcinatione, lib. 3. part. 5. cap. 6. p. m. 718. He alſo quotes Horace, ſat. 8. l. 1. and Cujas, in Paratit. cod. de Maleſic. & Mathemat.

Devovet abſentes, ſimulacraque cerea fingit
Et miſerum tenues in jecur urget acus (48).

" The abſent curſes; pricks the waxen image;
" And thruſts ſharp needles in th' ill-fated liver."

(49) It is nevertheleſs certain, that theſe images are ſometimes made in order to inſpire hatred. See Servius, on the following words of Virgil, Eclog. 8. ver. 80. Limus ut hic dureſcit, & hæc ut cera liqueſcit Uno eodemque igni.

I obſerve the Mercure François does not ſay, with Garaſſe, that Coſmo promiſed images, to inſpire hearts with love or hatred (49). He promiſed images, ſome to make women fall in love with thoſe who are fond of them; and others to make any perſons, at pleaſure, linger till they died, by repeating their names, and calling upon certain Devils (50). A whimſical ſtory is told of Tamerlane's daughters. It is related that their father cauſed them to be taught Magic; and that, by the help of certain images, they facilitated the conqueſt of ſuch provinces as he intended to ſubdue. Audivi ab aliquibus qui dictum Tamerlanum diu noverunt, quod habuit tres filias quas in arte magica fecit inſtrui, in qua mirabiliter profecerunt, quæ incantationes, & exorcizationes, & IMAGINES contra provincias quas ſibi ſubjicere voluit facere conſueverunt, quæ plerumque effectum ſortitæ fuerunt (51). IV. The argument in the following words is not juſt. This wretch . . . . carried on, from the year 1604, theſe infamous practices, though an Abbot; he fomenting the irregular paſſions of all the debauched courtiers. From this year M. DC IV. he began to take another courſe; he betaking himſelf to make almanacks, ſome under the name of Quelberus, others under the name of Vannerus, or the weeping Pilgrim of Savoy (52). Garaſſe had juſt before joined the making of waxen images, and the ſtudy of Aſtrology, as two things that prove one another; and then he immediately tells us, that as ſoon as Coſmo made almanacks, he left off giving thoſe images to debauched courtiers. We here have, beſides a contradiction, bad reaſoning. Though a perſon makes almanacks, he ſtill may be a cheat with regard to the images in queſtion. The Mercure François does not agree with Garaſſe, with regard to all prefixed to Ruggeri's almanacks. Compare the Jeſuit's words with the following (53). From the year one thouſand ſix hundred and four, he had made almanacks annually: ſome under the name of Querberus, others under the names of Vannerus, and the weeping Pilgrim of Savoy, which he embelliſhed with verſes or ſentences from the beſt Latin Poets or Orators.

(50) Mercure Franc. Tom. 4. p. 47. See alſo Thuanus's Continuator, book 8. p. 537.

(51) Theodoricus à Niem, de Schiſmate, lib. 2. p. m. 114.

(52) Garaſſe, p. 156.

(53) Mercure Franc. Tom. 4. p. 46.

[A] Famous for his Hiſtorical Collections.] The firſt volume was publiſhed at London 1659 in folio, under the title of Hiſtorical Collections of private paſſages of State, weighty Matters in Law, and remarkable proceedings in five Parliaments. Beginning the 16*th year of K. James*, ann. 1618, and ending the 5*th year of K. Charles*, ann. 1629. digeſted in order of time. Mr. Wood tells us (1), that when the Author " was " fitting and was interred on the Wedneſday following behind the pulpit in the Church of St. George's Southwark. He had ſeveral daughters, one of whom was married to Sir Francis Vane (a).

(1) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 847.

(a) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 846—849.

" fitting this book for the preſs, he made uſe of " certain manuſcripts in the hands of Bulſtrode " Whitelocke, one of Oliver's Lords; and when it " was finiſhed, he preſented it to the view of Oliver " himſelf; but he having no leiſure to peruſe it, " appointed the ſaid Whitelocke to do it, January " 1657, and accordingly running it over more than " once, he made ſome alterations in, and additions " to it. After it was finiſhed at the preſs, he dedi- " cated the book to Richard Cromwell, then Lord " Protector." The ſecond part of the Hiſtorical Collections, was printed at London in 1680, in folio, and the other parts. The whole was reprinted at London in 1722 in ſix volumes in folio. Dr. John Nalſon, LL. D. in his Impartial Collection of the great Affairs of State from the beginning of the Scotch Rebellion, ann. 1639. to the Murder of King Charles I. &c. printed at London in 1682 and 1683, in folio, endeavours to deſtroy the credit of Mr. Ruſhworth's Collections in ſeveral reſpects; but Mr. Rapin de Thoyras in his Hiſtory of England has undertaken to ſhew, that the exceptions of Dr. Nalſon are not ſufficient to diſcredit that work. T.

☞ RUSSEL, the name of an ancient and illuſtrious family [A], from which was deſcended William Lord Ruſſel, of whom we ſhall give an article, in order to inſert ſome original letters and papers never before publiſhed. He was third ſon of Francis Earl and afterwards Duke of Bedford by Anne daughter of Robert Carr Earl of Somerſet. In April 1679 he was appointed one of the new Council to his Majeſty, and in 1680 was elected Member of Parliament for the county of Bedford in that which began on the 21ſt of October the ſame year; and with great vigour promoted the Bill for the excluſion of the Duke of York from the Throne, which being paſſed the Houſe of Commons, he was ordered to carry it up to the Houſe of Lords, which he did on the 15th of November, attended by almoſt all the Members. But the Lords having rejected the Bill upon the firſt reading, the Commons were exaſperated at it, and Lord Ruſſel in particular ſaid, that if ever there ſhould happen in this nation any ſuch change, as that he ſhould not have liberty to live a Proteſtant, he was reſolved to die one; and therefore would not willingly have the hands of their enemies ſtrengthened, and alſo deſired the Lords not to deſtroy themſelves by their own hands; and if the Commons might not be ſo happy as to better the condition of the nation, he prayed the Lords would not make it worſe by giving money to the King, while they were ſure it muſt go to the hands of the Duke's creatures. But this and the like ſpeeches having diſguſted the Court, the Parliament was prorogued on the 10th of January, and diſſolved by Proclamation on the 18th 1680-1. However the neceſſity of the King's affairs requiring the meeting of another Parliament, his Majeſty called one, which aſſembled at Oxford on the 21ſt of March following, in which Lord Ruſſel ſerved again as Knight of the Shire for the County of Bedford. But another Bill of excluſion being moved for by Sir Robert

[A] An ancient and illuſtrious family.] It has been of long ſtanding in the county of Dorſet, where they were poſſeſſed of ſome fair Lordſhips for many ages paſt, as is manifeſt from the account of the Sheriff, the third of King John, anno 1202, when John Ruſſel gave that Prince fifty marks for licence to marry the ſiſter of a great man, called Doun Bardolf. This John was Conſtable of Corfe Caſtle in the county of Dorſet, anno 1221, the 5th of Henry III. and from him was deſcended John Ruſſel, Gentleman of the Privy Chamber to K. Henry VII. and created Baron of this Realm by Henry VIII. in 1538. and afterwards made Knight of the Garter, Lord Admiral, and Lord Privy Seal. He died at his houſe in the Strand in London, March the 14th 1554, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Francis, who was twice Embaſſador in France in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and died in 1584, leaving iſſue by his firſt wife, Margaret, daughter of Sir John St. John, four ſons, Edward, John, Francis, and William, and three daughters, whereof Anne was married to Ambroſe Dudley, Earl of Warwick, Elizabeth to William Bouchier Earl of Bath, and Margaret to George Clifford, the third Earl of Cumberland. Of the ſons, Edward died without iſſue; John married Elizabeth daughter of Sir Anthony Cook, Knt. and widow of Sir Tho. Holby, Knt. and dying in the year 1584 in his father's life-time, the eſtate and title deſcended to Francis, third ſon of Francis, the ſecond Earl of Bedford, who marrying Julian daughter of Sir John Forſter, Knt. had by her a ſon named Edward, but being ſlain on a day of truce by the Scots on the Borders, viz. June the 27th 1585, and his father dying on the 28th of July following, the ſaid Edward, the ſon of Francis who was ſlain, ſucceeded his grandfather, and was the third Earl of Bedford. He married Lucy eldeſt of the two ſiſters and coheirs of John Lord Harrington of Exton; but dying on the third of May 1627 without iſſue, we now return to Sir William Ruſſel, the fourth and youngeſt ſon of Francis, the ſecond Earl of Bedford; which Sir William in Auguſt 1594 had been appointed Lord Deputy of Ireland, and on the 2d of July 1603 created a Peer of England by the title of Lord Ruſſel of Thornhaugh in the county of Northampton; and having married Elizabeth, daughter and heir to Stengay Long of Shengay in the county of Cambridge, Eſq; by her left Francis his ſon and heir in his honour; which Francis, ſucceeding Edward his Couſin German in the Earldom of Bedford, became the fourth Earl thereof. This Francis having married Catharine ſole daughter of Giles Bridges, Lord Chandos, had by her four ſons and as many daughters; whereof Catharine the eldeſt was married to Robert Lord Brooke; Anne, to George Earl of Briſtol; Margaret, to James Earl of Carliſle; and Diana, to Francis Lord Newport, anceſtor to the preſent Earl of Bradford. Of the ſons, which were William, Francis, John, and Edward, the laſt marrying Penelope, daughter of Moſes Hill of Aileſbury in the Kingdom of Ireland, by her had a ſon named Edward, and a daughter Letitia; which daughter was married to Thomas Cheek of Pyrgo in the county of Eſſex, Eſq; and by him had a daughter named Anne, who was their heir, and ſhe being married to Sir Tho. Tipping of Whitfield in the county of Oxford, Bart. and dying January the 21ſt 1727-8, left two daughters by the ſaid Sir Thomas Tipping, one married to Thomas Archer of Umberſlade in the county of Warwick, Eſq; and the other to Samuel Sandys, Eſq; of Ombersley Court in Worceſterſhire, who has ſerved for the city of Worceſter in ſeveral Parliaments. Edward, the ſon of Edward Ruſſel, bert Clayton, who was ſeconded by Lord Ruſſel, the Parliament was ſoon after diſſolved, and no other ever was called during the reign of King Charles II. In 1683 his Lordſhip was committed priſoner to the Tower upon a charge of High-Treaſon, and on the 13th of July was tried at the Old Baily for conſpiring the death of the King, &c. and condemned. His behaviour after condemnation and at his death will appear from an account drawn up by Dr. Gilbert Burnet, which we ſhall give the reader from the original [B], and of which he has given an abſtract in the firſt volume of the Hiſtory of his own Time.

While

Ruſſel, and Penelope Hill before-mentioned, was May the 7th 1697 created Earl of Orford, and married the Lady Margaret, third and youngeſt daughter to William the firſt Duke of Bedford, his father's brother, and died without iſſue November the 26th 1727, in the 75th year of his age. We now return to William, Francis, and John, the three eldeſt ſons of Francis Earl of Bedford by Catharine Bridges his wife beforementioned; whereof John the youngeſt was a Colonel in the civil wars for King Charles I, and after the reſtoration of King Charles II made Colonel of the firſt regiment of foot-guards. Francis, the ſecond ſon, died unmarried; but William, the eldeſt, ſucceeded his father, and was the fifth Earl of Bedford. Upon the breaking out of the civil wars, he was appointed General of the Parliament's Horſe, which poſt he quitted in 1643. In 1672 he was elected Knight of the Garter. May the 11th 1694, he was created Marquis of Taveſtock and Duke of Bedford. He died September the 7th 1700. By Anne, daughter to Robert Earl of Somerſet, he had ſeven ſons and three daughters; whereof Diana, the eldeſt, was firſt married to Sir Grevil Verney of Compton-Verney in the county of Warwick, Knight of the Bath, and afterwards to William Lord Allington; Anne the ſecond died young; and Margaret was married to Edward Ruſſel, Earl of Orford beforementioned. Of the ſons, which were Francis, John, William, Edward, Robert, James, and George; James, who was ſeated at Maidwell in the county of Northampton, and died June the 22d 1712, aged 67, left by Elizabeth his ſecond wife, an only daughter named Trephena, wife of Thomas Stawen Eſq; Knight of the ſhire for the county of Surrey. Edward, the fourth ſon, died June the 21ſt 1714; Francis, the eldeſt, died without iſſue; and John, the ſecond, died in his infancy; but William, the third ſon, was beheaded July the 21ſt 1683, in his father's life-time. He married the Lady Rachel, ſecond daughter and coheir of Thomas Wriotheſly, Earl of Southampton, Lord High Treaſurer of England, and widow of Francis Lord Vaughan, eldeſt ſon of Richard Earl of Carbery; and by her, who died September the 29th 1723, aged 87 years, left iſſue one ſon named Wriotheſly, and two daughters; whereof the Lady Rachel, the eldeſt, was married to William Cavendiſh Duke of Devonſhire, and the Lady Catharine to John Manners, Marquis of Granby, afterwards Duke of Rutland. May the 23d 1695 the ſaid Wriotheſly, ſon of Lord William Ruſſel, who was beheaded, married Elizabeth, only daughter and heir of John Howland of Stretham in the county of Surrey Eſq; (by Elizabeth his wife, half-ſiſter to Sir Richard Child Bart. now Earl Tilney) and was thereupon created Baron Howland of Stretham, June the 13th 1695, and on the 7th of September 1700 ſucceeding his grandfather became Duke of Bedford, and March the 13th 1702-3 he was inſtalled Knight of the Garter, and died of the ſmall-pox May the 26th 1711, in the 31ſt year of his age, leaving iſſue three ſons and two daughters; of whom the Lady Rachel, the eldeſt, is married to Scroop Egerton Duke of Bridgwater, and the Lady Elizabeth to William Capel, Earl of Eſſex. Of the ſons, who were William, Wriotheſly, and John, the eldeſt died in his infancy; Wriotheſly, who was born in 1708, and ſucceeded his father as Duke of Bedford, on the 22d of April 1725 married the Lady Anne Egerton only daughter of the abovementioned Scroop Duke of Bridgewater by the Lady Elizabeth Churchill, third daughter and coheir to John Duke of Marlborough, but died without iſſue October the 23d 1732; by which means the Honour deſcended to his only ſurviving brother the Lord John Ruſſel, now Duke of Bedford, born September the 30th 1710, who, October the 11th 1731, married the Lady Diana Spencer grand-daughter to John Duke of Marlborough, and younger daughter of Charles late Earl of Sunderland, by whom he had a ſon, who died the day he was born, on the 6th of November 1732, and her Grace alſo died on the 27th of September 1735. His Grace has ſince married a daughter of the Right honourable the Lord Gower.

[B] His behaviour after condemnation and at his death will appear from an account drawn up by Dr. Gilbert Burnet, which we ſhall give the reader from the original.] It is as follows:

" The firſt time I came to my Lord Ruſſel, which " was on Monday at three a clock, he received me " with his ordinary civility and ſmiling countenance, " in all reſpects as he uſed to do. He was then " folding up his letter to the Duke, which he ſhewed " me, and ſaid, This will be printed, and will be ſelling about the ſtreets as my ſubmiſſion, when I am led out to be hanged. He ſaid, there was nothing in the " letter that went againſt him, but the whole of " writing to one, whom he had ſo much oppoſed. " As he was folding up the paper, he told me the " ſtory of Colonel Sidney's raſor with as much chearfulneſs as ever I ſaw in him. Then he fell a lamenting my Lord of Eſſex's misfortune, and ſaid, " a great part of it was on his account; which he gathered from a meſſage he had ſent to his father " the night before, that he was ſorrier for his ſon's " condition than he was; and from the time in " which he did it; and the reaſon of it he believed " was, that the Earl of Eſſex had almoſt forced him " to admit my Lord Howard to a meeting at his " houſe. For when he ſaw the Lord Howard, Colonel Sidney, and Mr. Hampden coming in, he ſaid " to the Earl of Eſſex, who was come before, What have we to do with this R——? and would have " gone out, but the Earl of Eſſex made him ſtay. " Yet he ſaid, having that miſtruſt he ſaid very little. And (to put all that belongs to this matter " together) the night before his death, he ſaid to me " in my Lady's hearing, that my Lord Howard in " many particulars had ſworn falſely, and done him " wrong. But I did not reckon them up. He " added concerning the Earl of Eſſex, that the day " before he, ſeeing his window open, looked towards " it through the glaſs in the head of his ſtaff, and " ſaw him leave the window as ſoon as he appeared, " and go into the room. So that he believed his " condition gave the fatal criſis to his melancholy. " He ſpoke often of him to me, and very largely, " the day before his death. He ſaid, he was the " worthieſt, the juſteſt, the ſincereſt, and moſt concerned for the publick of any man he ever knew. " And he alſo told me, that my Lord of Eſſex was " afterwards much troubled for admitting the Lord " Howard to their meetings, and thought he would " betray them; upon which he anſwered, he had " ventured upon the confidence the other had in him; " for, added he, if you ſhould betray me, every body " would blame you, and not me; but if we ſhould " let ſuch a man as my Lord Howard betray us, every " body would blame us, as much as him. Theſe " diſcourſes laſted about half an hour till my Lady " was gone with the letter, and then he entered upon " the ſerioueſt diſcourſes I ever heard. He told " me, for death, he thanked God, as a man he ne" ver was afraid of it, and did not conſider it with " ſo much apprehenſion as the drawing of a tooth. " But he ſaid, he found the courage of a man, that " could venture in the heat of blood, was very diffe" rent from the courage of a dying Chriſtian and " dying in cold blood. That muſt come from an in" ward peace of conſcience and aſſurance of the " mercy of God; and that he had to ſuch a degree,

" that

While he lay under ſentence of death he wrote a letter to the Duke of York dated from Newgate July the 16th, which was delivered to the Dutcheſs of York by the Lady Ruſſel;

" that though from the firſt day of his impriſonment " he reckoned he was a dead man, it had never " given him any ſort of trouble. He added, that " God knows, the trouble, I ſaw him in ſome weeks " ago when his ſon was ill, had gone nearer his " heart, and taken more of his reſt from him, than " his preſent condition had done. And he remem- " bered of a colic he had lately, which had filled " him with ſo much pain, and ſo oppreſſed his ſpirits, " that he ſaw how little a man could do, if he came " to die in ſuch a manner; whereas he had now all " his thoughts perfectly about him, and had no other " apprehenſions of death, but being a little gazed at " by his friends and enemies, and a moment's pain. " He ſaid, though he had been guilty of many de- " fects and failings (amongſt which he reckoned his " ſeldom receiving the Sacrament) yet he thanked " God, he had a clear conſcience, not only in rela- " tion to the publick, (in which he had gone ſo ſin- " cerely, that he was ſure he had nothing to anſwer " for but the ſins of ignorance, and ſome indecent " diſcourſes, in which he had been generally more " guilty by hearing them, and being pleaſed with " them, than by much ſpeaking) but in relation to " all his other concerns. He had ſpent much, but " it was in no ill way. He could never limit his " bounty to his condition; and all the thoughts he " had of the great eſtate that was to deſcend upon " him was to do more good with it; for he had " reſolved not to live much above the pitch he was " then at. He thanked God, that now for theſe " many years he had made great conſcience of all " he did; ſo that the ſins of omiſſion was the chief " thing he had to anſwer for. God knew the " ſincerity of his heart, that he could not go into a " thing he thought ill, nor could he tell a lie. Af- " ter an hour's diſcourſe, we prayed together. Then " he came to talk of his condition. He then " thought the ſentence would perhaps be executed by " hanging. But he ſaid, if his friends could bear " that as well as he could, it was no matter. He " next fell to ſpeak of a paper to be left behind " him. He was reſolved to ſay very little on the " ſcaffold, but to leave a larger paper. So he went " over the heads he thought fit to ſpeak to, which " I perceived he had conſidered much. He ſaid he " had much leiſure in the Tower, and had always " looked for this, for that he did not doubt but the " Sheriff would take care to return ſuch a Jury as " was reſolved to condemn him, if the King's Coun- " cil ſhould bid them. So he had been forming in " his mind what was fit for him to do in this matter; " for in moſt of the particulars he expreſſed himſelf " very near in the ſame words that are in his paper. " So I left him for that night. He deſired me to " come again the next day at noon; and in his mo- " deſt way deſired as much of my time as I could " conveniently ſpare.

" Next day I came to him, and found him in the " ſame temper I had left him, ſo ſedate, and upon " occaſion ſo chearful, that I never ſaw the like " before. He then went again over the heads of " his paper, and a minute was made of the points " he was to write of according to their order. I ſhall " not mix in this relation any thing of what I ſaid " to him upon any of them; but this in general, " that I diſcharged my conſcience in all reſpects, " both as a faithful ſubject to the King, and as a " ſincere Miniſter of the Goſpel ought to have done. " The thing is as it is, and I will neither ſay what " I approved or diſapproved; but this I will add, " that all the critical and nicer parts were very well " weighed, to an exactneſs in the choice of every " word. He thought it was incumbent upon him to " write all he writ; but he promiſed me to conſider " every thing, that I had offered to him. When " this was done, he run out into a long diſcourſe of " the providence of God in this matter. Rumſey " and Lord Howard were two men he had always a " ſecret horror at. Shepherd he thought better of, " till he was told he had betrayed Walcot. Then he " ſaid he wondered not he had ſworn falſely of him; " but till then he thought he had forgot himſelf. " His coming up to town occaſionally; his being " called by the Duke of Monmouth with ſo good an " intention; his not going to a formal meeting, " where Rumſey was not, but to that where he was " preſent; and the fatal melancholy of the Earl of " Eſſex that morning; all had ſuch marks of a " Providence of God, that he was fully ſatisfied, it " was well ordered by God for ſome good ends, that " it ſhould be as it was. After two hours diſcourſe " my Lady came. He dined, eat, and drank as " heartily, and did every thing in as chearful a man- " ner, as he uſed to do. Then he heard (though but " doubtfully) that Saturday was the day. So he " wiſhed to have two days more, that he might finiſh " his paper. After dinner he called for tea, and " talked of the State of Hungary and the affairs of " Europe juſt as he uſed to do. When my Lady " was gone, he expreſſed great joy in the magnani- " mity of ſpirit he ſaw in her; and ſaid, the part- " ing with her was the greateſt thing he had to do; " for he was afraid, ſhe would be hardly able to bear " it. The concern about preſerving him filled her " mind ſo now, that it in ſome meaſure ſupported " her; but when that would be over, he feared the " quickneſs of her ſpirits would work all within her. " From this he turned to ſpeak of his condition, " which he did in the ſame ſtrain he had done the " day before. He ſaid he was ſtill very glad he had " not fled; for he could not have lived from his " children, and wife, and friends: that was all the " happineſs he ſaw in life. He was glad, that " ſome, who had not lived ſo as to be fit to die, had " eſcaped. And a propoſition being ſent him by one " of the generouſeſt and gallanteſt friends in the " world, of a deſign for making his eſcape, he, in " his ſmiling way, ſent his thanks very kindly to " him; but ſaid, he would make no eſcape. But " (now I remember better) this was on Wedneſday. " After this we prayed, and I left him.

" On Wedneſday I came to him at noon (the hour " he had appointed) and found he had writ three " pages of the eight, of which his paper conſiſts, but " had left ſome ſpaces void for ſome nicer things; " and he drew in other pieces of paper what he had " intended to fill them up with. And after dinner, " (during which, as in all his meals, he behaved " himſelf in his ordinary manner) he ſhewed it to " my Lady; and after a little diſcourſe he filled up " the void ſpaces; which he did with that ſevere " ſtrictneſs, that it was viſible he would not ſay a " word but what was exactly according to his con- " ſcience. Then upon ſome diſcourſe upon his writ- " ing to the King, he chearfully reſolved on it. For " though he always ſaid, he never did any thing " that he thought contrary to his intereſt; yet many " railleries and other indecent things had paſſed, for " which he prayed God to forgive him, and reſolved " to aſk the King's pardon. And he ſaid, he thought " he muſt likewiſe let the King know, that he alſo " forgave him; and he himſelf hit on that expreſ- " ſion [of all concerned in his death from the higheſt to the loweſt.] After ſome more diſcourſe, his father " and uncle came to ſee him; and we all prayed " again, and I left him for that night.

" On Thurſday I came at noon, and found he " had got very near the end of his paper; ſo that " he concluded it before dinner. Only again I ſaw " new void ſpaces, and ſaw on other papers blotted " draughts of what he deſigned to put in them. " And he likewiſe filled them up before he dined; " ſo that he was at great eaſe. Upon this my Lady " came in, and told him the reſpite till Monday " was denied. This touched him a little; but I " perceived it only in his looks; but he ſaid no- " thing but that he thought ſuch a thing was never " denied to common felons. Yet when he conſi- " dered, that he had done with his papers, he was

" preſently

Ruſſel; and another to the King, dated July the 19th, to be delivered to his Majeſty after

" preſently very well ſatisfied, and ſaid afterwards, " he was glad it was not granted, for all that he " deſired it for, was that he might have one whole " day for the concerns of his ſoul, and have nothing " to mix with them. So he dined, and after dinner " he wrote his letter to the King. Then he wrote " his ſpeech he intended to make to the Sheriffs. " Only upon the report of what Capt. Walcot had " ſaid of him, he added thoſe words relating to " that on Friday. Then he was more compoſed " than ever; for all was done, that could have given " him any uneaſy work to his thoughts. He ſpake " of all people, that had appeared againſt him, par- " ticularly of the Lord Howard, with great pity, " but with no reſentment. He ſaid he had been " well enough known before; but now it was ſo " much better, that he could betray no body any " more. When my Lady went, he ſaid, he wiſhed " ſhe would give over beating every buſh, and run- " ning ſo about for his preſervation. But when he " conſidered, that it would be ſome mitigation of " her ſorrow afterwards, that ſhe left nothing un- " done, that could have given any probable hopes, " he acquieſced; and indeed I never ſaw his heart " ſo near failing him, as when he ſpake of her. " Sometimes I ſaw a tear in his eye, and he would " turn about, and preſently change the diſcourſe. " He reſolved to receive the Sacrament on Friday; " and ſo reſolved to ſpend that day, as he intended " to have done the Lord's-day, had he lived ſo long. " The Sacrament was to be given him early in the " morning, becauſe of Captain Richardſon's attend- " ance on the other executions that day. So the " Dean of Canterbury, who was with him every " day, except Thurſday (in which he was engaged) " come in the morning, and gave it him according " to the Common-Prayer; which he received with " that grave and ſedate devotion, that ſtill appeared " in him. His man deſired to receive with him; " ſo the Captain took our promiſe, that there ſhould " be nothing done, while his man was in the room " but the giving of the Sacrament; and therefore " till it was over, the Dean ſpake nothing to him. " But after that, the Dean aſked him of his believ- " ing all the Articles of Chriſtian Religion, which " were indeed the doctrine of this Church. He ſaid " he did believe them truly. Then he aſked him " of his forgiving all perſons. That, he ſaid, he " did from his heart. And in the laſt place he told " him, he hoped he would diſcharge his conſcience " in full and free Confeſſion. He aſſured him he " had done it; ſo the Dean left him. None but " my Lady and I ſtaid; and that morning I preach- " ed two ſermons to him; the firſt was on Rev. xiv. " 13. the ſecond on Pſalm xxiii. 4. They were a- " bout half an hour in length, and there was an " interval of about two hours between. He was " pleaſed to tell me at night, that what I ſpake came " into his heart, and he believed it was ſent to him " from God. In the interval he told me, he could " not pretend to ſuch high joys and longings, but on " entire reſignation of himſelf to the will of God, " and a perfect ſerenity of his mind. He ſaid he " once had ſome trouble, becauſe he found not thoſe " longings, Mr. Hampden the younger had, of whom " he ſpake often with great kindneſs and eſteem. " He had a few days before his commitment given " him from Mr. Baxter his late book of Dying " Thoughts; and he found many things in that ſo pat " to his own condition, that he bleſſed God for the " comforts of that book. He dined as he uſed to " do. After dinner he ſigned the copies of his pa- " pers, and wiſhed it might be that night ſent to " the preſs; which my Lady ordered by his direction.

" After Dinner his children were brought to " him. I ſaw him receive them with his ordinary " ſerenity; but I ſtaid not till he diſmiſſed them. " I left him for about three hours, and came to him " at eight a clock. He ſupped very chearfully, and " after ſupper fell into a long and pleaſant diſcourſe " of his two daughters; and of ſeveral other things. " He deſired me to pray both before ſupper and at " his parting with my Lady. He talked of ſeveral " paſſages concerning dying men with that freedom " in his ſpirit, that made us all ſtare one upon ano- " ther. And when a note was ſent to my Lady of " a new project for his preſervation, he did ſo treat " it in ridicule, that I was amazed, and I wondered " much, that when he ſaw us, that were about him, " not able to contain our griefs, he, who was ſo " tender himſelf, was not by that more ſoftned.

" At ten a clock my Lady left him. He kiſſed " her four or five times, and ſhe kept her ſorrow " ſo within herſelf, that ſhe gave him no diſturbance " by their parting. After ſhe was gone, he ſaid, " Now the bitterneſs of death is paſt; and ran out into " a long diſcourſe concerning her; how great a " bleſſing ſhe had been to him; and ſaid, what a " miſery it would have been to him, if ſhe had not " had that magnanimity of ſpirit joined to her ten- " derneſs, as never to have deſired him to do a baſe " thing for the ſaving of his life. Whereas other- " wiſe what a week ſhould have paſſed, if ſhe had " been crying on me to turn Informer, and be a Lord " Howard! Though he then repeated what he had " often before ſaid, that he knew of nothing where- " by the peace of the nation was in danger; and " that all that ever was, was either looſe diſcourſe, " or at moſt embryos, that never came to any thing; " ſo that there was nothing on foot to his knowledge. " But he left that diſcourſe, and returned to ſpeak " of my Lady. He ſaid, there was a ſignal Provi- " dence of God in giving him ſuch a wife, where " there was birth, fortune, great underſtanding, great " Religion, and great kindneſs to him; but her " carriage in his extremity was beyond all. He ſaid, " he was glad that ſhe and his children were to loſe " nothing by his death; and it was great comfort to " him, that he left his children in ſuch a mother's " hands; and that ſhe had promiſed to him to take " care of herſelf for their ſakes; which I heard her " do. Then he left this diſcourſe, and talked of his " change, how great a change death made, and how " wonderful thoſe new ſcenes would ſtrike on a ſoul. " He had heard how ſome, that had been born " blind, were ſtruck, when, by the couching of " their cataracts, they ſaw. But what, ſaid he, if " the firſt thing one ſaw were the ſun-riſing?

" About twelve he undreſſed himſelf, and was lock- " ed in, having given order to call him at four; ſo " at four we called him, and he was faſt aſleep. He " dreſſed himſelf as he uſed to do, neither with " more nor leſs care; only he would not loſe time " to be ſhaved. He was in the ſame temper he had " always been in, and thanked God he felt no ſort of " fear nor hurry in his thoughts. We prayed toge- " ther with ſome intervals, five or ſix times; and be- " tween hands, he often went into his chamber, " and prayed by himſelf. Once he came out with " more than ordinary joy, and ſaid he had been " much inſpired in his laſt prayer, and wiſhed he " could have writ it down, and ſent it to his wife. " The Dean came, and prayed, and ſpake alſo with " him. We both looked at one another, amazed " at the temper he was in. He gave me ſeveral com- " miſſions to his relations; but none more earneſt " than to one of them, againſt all revenges for " what had been done to him. He told me, he was " to give me his watch, and wound it up, and ſaid, " I have done with time; now eternity comes. The " ring, in which the ribband goes, broke in his " hands; which he thought a little ſtrange. He " once was giving me his watch in the priſon; but " he thought it would be more decent to do it on the " ſcaffold. He alſo called a ſtory to mind, which " might perhaps come to be talked of, in which " another was concerned; and though his part was " worthy and truly religious, there is a very good " reaſon why it ſhould not be ſpoken of; ſo he charg- " ed me never to ſpeak of it, unleſs I heard it talked " of, and then he left me to my diſcretion. I con- " feſs, when he began with a charge of ſecrecy, I " thought it was ſomething relating to the publick; " and I told him, I could not promiſe it. But it " was wholly of another nature.

" He continued in this temper to the laſt. He " called after his Lordſhip's death. Theſe two letters ſhall be inſerted from the copies of them written by the Lady Ruſſel's own hand [C]. His Lordſhip was beheaded in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields July the 21ſt 1683. The paper, which he left in the Sheriff's hands, gave great

" called for tea, and drank two diſhes; and about " half an hour before he expected to be called on, he " drank a glaſs of ſherry, and eat a mouthful of " bread. He aſked the Dean how Sir Richard Cor- " bet (who he heard was ſick) did, and when he " ſaw Col. Titus, and deſired to be remembered to " him; and was aſking, if they were taking up any " more, juſt as Capt. Richardſon told him the Sheriffs " were come. So he withdrew for half a quarter " of an hour, and then came out with no alteration " in his looks.

" As he came down, my Lord Cavendiſh was be- " low, and he took leave of him; but when he " left him, he remembered of ſomewhat of great " importance, and went back to him, and ſpake to " him with great earneſtneſs. He told me what it " was in general, and wiſhed me to ſecond it. He " went out to his coach with his ordinary chearful- " neſs, and wondered to ſee ſo great a crowd.

" As we were going, he looked about him ſtill, " and knew ſeveral perſons. Some he ſaw ſtaring " on him, who knew him, and did not put off their " hats. He ſaid there was great joy in ſome; but " that did not touch him ſo much as the tears he ob- " ſerved in other people's eyes; for that, he ſaid, " made him tender. I obſerved he was ſinging of- " ten within himſelf, but could not hear the words. " I aſked him what he ſang? He ſaid it was the " beginning of the 119th Pſalm; but he ſhould ſing " better very ſoon. And obſerving the crowd, he " ſaid he ſhould ſoon ſee a greater and better company.

" As we came by Warwick-houſe, obſerving all " ſhut up there, he aſked, if my Lord Clare was out " of town. I told him, he could not think any " windows would be open there upon this occaſion.

" As we came to turn into Little-Queen-ſtreet, he " ſaid, I have often turned to the other hand with " great comfort; but now I turn to this with greater; " and looked towards his own houſe, and then, as " the Dean of Canterbury, who ſat over againſt him, " told me, he ſaw a tear or two fall from him.

" When we came into the field, he wondered to " ſee ſuch a crowd. I remember it rained as we " were in the way; and he ſaid to us, this rain may " do you hurt, that are bare-headed. And the " night before at ſupper, when he heard it rain hea- " vily, he ſaid it would ſpoil the ſhew to morrow, " if the rain ſhould continue; for a ſhew in a rainy " day was a very dull thing.

" After all was quiet, he ſpake to the Sheriffs " what he intended, of which he read the greater " part. Then he deſired the Dean to pray. After " that, he ſpake a word to the Dean, and gave him " his ring, and gave me his watch, and bid me go " to Southampton-houſe and to Bedford houſe, and " deliver the commiſſions that he had given me in " charge. Then he kneeled down, and prayed about " three or four minutes by himſelf. Afterwards he " undreſſed himſelf. He had brought a night-cap " in his own pocket, fearing leſt his man might not " get up to him. But on the way he obſerved him " walking very ſad by the coach, and ſaid, Taun- " ton has been a faithful ſervant to me; and I hope, " if my ſon lives, he ſhall ſerve him as long as he " has done me.

" He threw off his periwig, and put on his night- " cap, and then unbuttoned his coat, and let it be " drawn off. After that he took off his cravat; and " all this without the leaſt change of countenance. " And with the ſame courage, after he had given " the Executioner what he intended him, (which he " had forgot to do at firſt) he laid himſelf along, " and ſaid he would give no ſign. But when he had " lain down, I looked once at him, and ſaw no " change in his looks; and though he was ſtill lift- " ing up his hands, there was no trembling, though " in the moment in which I looked, the Executioner " happened to be laying his ax to his neck, to di- " rect him to take aim: I thought it touched him; " but am ſure he ſeemed not to mind it.

" This is a punctual and true relation of all that " I can remember between him and me.

" G. B."

[C] Theſe two letters ſhall be inſerted from the copies of them, written by the Lady Ruſſel's own hand.]

The former is endorſed, A copy of my Lord's letter to the Duke, which I delivered to the Ducheſſe.

" May it pleaſe your Royal Highneſs,

" The oppoſition I have appeared in to your Royal " Highneſs's intereſt, has been ſuch, as I have ſcarce " the confidence to be a petitioner to you, though in " order to the ſaving of my life. Sir, God knows " what I did, did not proceed from any perſonal ill " will or animoſity to your Royal Highneſs; but " merely becauſe I was of opinion, that it was the " beſt way for preſerving the religion eſtabliſhed by " law; in which, if I was miſtaken, yet I acted ſin- " cerely, without any ill end in it. And as for any " baſe deſign againſt your perſon, I hope your Royal " Highneſs will be ſo juſt to me, as not to think me " capable of ſo vile a thought. But I am now reſolved, " and do faithfully engage myſelf, that if it ſhall " pleaſe the King to pardon me, and if your Royal " Highneſs will interpoſe in it, I will in no ſort " meddle any more in the leaſt oppoſition to your " Royal Highneſs; but will be readily determined to " live in any part of the world, which his Majeſty " ſhall preſcribe, and will never fail in my daily " prayers, both for his Majeſty's preſervation and ho- " nour, and your Royal Highneſs's happineſs; and " will wholly withdraw myſelf from the affairs " of England, unleſs called by his Majeſty's orders " to ſerve him; which I ſhall never be wanting to " do to the uttermoſt of my power. And if your " Royal Highneſs will be ſo gracious to me, as to " move on my account, as it will be an engagement " upon me beyond what I can in reaſon expect, ſo it " will make the deepeſt impreſſions on me poſſible; for " no fear of death can work ſo much with me, as ſo " great an obligation will for ever do upon,

" May it pleaſe your Royal Highneſs,
" Your Royal Highneſs's moſt humble
Newgate, " and moſt obedient ſervant,
16 July,
1683, " W. Ruſſell."

The latter is endorſed, A copy of my Lord's letter to the King, to be delivered after his death, and was ſo by his uncle Colonel Ruſſell.

" May it pleaſe your Majeſty,

" Since this is not to be delivered till after my " death, I hope your Majeſty will forgive the pre- " ſumption of an attainted man's writing to you. My " chief buſineſs is humbly to aſk your pardon for any " thing that I have either ſaid or done, that might " look like want of reſpect to your Majeſty, or duty " to your government; in which, though I do to " the laſt moment acquit myſelf of all deſigns againſt " your perſon, or of altering of the government, and " proteſt I know of no deſign now on foot againſt " either; yet I do not deny but I have heard many " things, and ſaid ſome things, contrary to my duty; " for which, as I have aſked God's pardon, ſo I " humbly beg your Majeſty's. And I take the liber- " ty to add, that though I have met with hard mea- " ſure, yet I forgive all concerned in it from the " higheſt to the loweſt; and I pray God to bleſs both " your perſon and government, and that the publick " peace and the true Proteſtant religion may be pre- " ſerved under you. And I crave leave to end my " days with this ſincere proteſtation, that my heart " was ever devoted to that which I thought was your " true intereſt; in which, if I was miſtaken, I hope " your diſpleaſure againſt me will end with my life, " and that no part of it ſhall fall on my wife and great offence to the Court; and Dr. Gilbert Burnet was particularly charged as the Author of it, from which imputation he vindicated himſelf in a paper, which ſhall be given from the original in the remark [D]; and the Lady Ruſſel wrote a letter to his Majeſty

" children; which is the laſt petition will ever be " offered you from,

" May it pleaſe your Majeſty,

" Your Majeſty's moſt faithful, moſt

Newgate, " dutiful, and moſt obedient ſubject,

July 19,

1683. " W. Ruſſell."

[D] He vindicates himſelf in a paper, which ſhall be given from the original in the remark.]

Indorſed in the Lady Ruſſel's hand, An account of what paſt concerning his laſt ſpeech and paper betweene my Lord and the Doctor. The larger papers of paſſages and diſcourſe I gave my ſon about 705.

" An Account of all that paſſed between the " late Lord Ruſſell and me concerning his laſt ſpeech " and paper.

" On Monday the 16th of July my Lady Ruſſell " told me, that her huſband deſired me to come to " him. So I went to Newgate about three a clock " in the afternoon; and after ſome hours diſcourſe " on other ſubjects he told me, he intended to leave " ſomewhat behind him in writing, and went over " the heads of it very near in the ſame words, in " which they are expreſſed in the paper. There was " one thing indeed, that I ſuggeſted, which he had " not in his thoughts: it was concerning practice " with the witneſſes in the Popiſh plot. I told him, " I did not think he was capable of any ſuch thing; " but if by any hint he had reaſon to think there was " any practice in that matter, it was a great ſin for " him to have carried on any thing upon ſuch evi- " dence. He thanked me for ſaying this to him, " and ſaid he would clear himſelf of it. We had " alſo great diſcourſe about the unlawfulneſs of re- " ſiſtance; and I thought that by the ground I gained " at firſt, it would be eaſy to perſuade him, that it " was abſolutely unlawful. But indeed he went no " further at firſt than he did at laſt; yet I thought " the ſtep he made, gave further hopes; and ſo I " told the Dean of Canterbury, that I believed he " was convinced of it; but the ſequel of this will " appear afterwards. On Tueſday I went to him a- " gain, and he went over the points, concerning " which he intended to write, and a memorandum was " made on a little piece of paper in 8vo of the heads, " and the order, in which he intended to ſay them. " I again went over the point of the unlawfulneſs of re- " ſiſtance, and laid it fully open to him. So having " thus prepared himſelf, he ſent away my Lady on " Wedneſday morning, and ordered that none ſhould " be admitted till noon. When I came to him at " noon, I found he had written three pages of the " twelve, of which his paper conſiſts; and that he " had left two void ſpaces; the reſt he had writ with " the run of his pen; but theſe paſſages he would " not fill up till he had firſt formed them in other " pieces of paper. My Lady came in ſoon after me, " and ſaw how far he had gone, together with the " void ſpaces; and after dinner he filled them up. " But he ſaw by his memorandum, that he had much " yet before him; and it was that that made him " ſo deſirous of a reprieve till Monday. But doubt- " ing that might not be granted, he reſolved to ſet " cloſe to it on Thurſday. So he ſent away my " Lady by ſix a clock, and was ſo preſſing to be left " alone, that he would not let her ſtay till her coach " ſhould come, and he renewed his orders, that none " might be admitted to him till one a clock. When " I came to him at that hour, I found that he had " not above half an hour's writing before him; but " there were again ſome void ſpaces; two of which " I well remember, and I ſaw lying before him the " draughts of what he had intended for filling them " up; and I believe there were more of thoſe blotted " draughts, for I ſaw him burn a handful of foul " papers after dinner; but I only looked on the " blotted draughts of thoſe two parts of his paper. " My Lady came in ſoon after me, and ſaw likewiſe " all he had written, and one of the void ſpaces not " yet filled up. She likewiſe ſaw the foul draughts " he had written for ſome of them. After dinner " he writ his letter to the King, and what he in- " tended to ſay to the Sheriff. Only having a report " of Captain Walcot's having accuſed him as know- " ing the plot, and being deep in it, he added on " Friday that part of his ſhort ſpeech, which relates " to it; and ſo he concluded all he had to write. " In his paper he writ theſe words relating to the " matter of reſiſtance: For my part, I cannot deny, " but that I have been of opinion, that a free nation " like this might defend their Religion and Liberties, " when invaded, and taken from them, though under " pretence and colour of law. But ſome eminent and " worthy Divines, who have had the charity to be " often with me, and whom I value and eſteem to a " very great degree, have offered me weighty reaſons to " perſuade me, that Faith and Patience are the proper " ways for the preſervation of Religion, and the method " of the Goſpel is to ſuffer perſecution rather than to uſe " reſiſtance. But if I have ſinned in this, I hope God " will not lay it to my charge, ſince he knows it was " only a ſin of ignorance. In this he thought not fit " to come up to a poſitve renunciation of that opi- " nion. So the Dean of Canterbury, when a great " part of the paper was read to him on Friday morn- " ing, was ſorry to find it ſo defective; but being " then called away ſuddenly, by reaſon of Captain " Richardſon's being obliged to attend the execu- " tions, he had not leiſure to ſpeak of it at that " time, but came in the afternoon, and preſt my " Lord very earneſtly to deliver himſelf more fully " in that matter, and gave him a paper concerning " it; and as he came out meeting me, he had much " diſcourſe with me about it, and wiſhed me to preſs " my Lord home in the thing, which I aſſured him " I had done, and would again reinforce it, though " I did not think it likely he would go much fur- " ther. He wiſhed me either to carry him further, " or to daſh out that whole paragraph, ſince the con- " cluſion of it was ſo cold; and he wiſhed, that the " firſt part of it might be quite left out. So I " waited on my Lord, and ſpake home to him about " it. He told me, he could not ſay a lie, and he " was ſure I would not deſire it; and he was ſure, if " he went further, he muſt needs lie. He ſaid, he " had not leiſure now to ſtudy Politics. The notion " he had of laws and of the Engliſh government " was different from ours; yet he ſaid, ſo far did " he ſubmit to us, and to the reaſons we had offered " him, that he was willing to go ſo far as he had " done, but he could not go further without being " diſingenuous. So when at laſt I propoſed the daſh- " ing out the whole paragraph, he was very well " ſatisfied, and ſaid his chief reaſon for putting it " in was to prevent any inconveniency that might " come to us; ſo it was ſtruck out. But he ſaid " often, that whatever his opinion might be in caſes " of extremity, he was againſt theſe ways, and ever " thought a Parliamentary cure was the proper reme- " dy for all the diſtempers of the nation; and ſaid " that he and a few more (I think he ſaid either " half a dozen or half a ſcore) had taken much " pains to moderate people's heats for three years " together, and had ever perſuaded their friends to " be quiet, and wait for a Parliament. I am far " from covering myſelf with a pretence of the ſeal " of confeſſion, and upon that refuſing to anſwer to " any thing, that has been aſked me; for I will " know nothing, in which the ſtate is concerned, un- " der ſecrecy; of which I gave this clear inſtance: " for about half an hour before he was carried out, " he called me to his chamber, and told me, he was " to lodge a ſecret with me, but deſired a promiſe

" of

Majeſty a few days after his Lordſhip's death, to aſſure him, that her huſband was the real Author of that paper delivered to the Sheriff [E].

" of ſecrecy, except it happened to be talked of, " I ſtopped him, and ſaid, if it concerned the go- " vernment, I would not promiſe ſecrecy. But I " found it was of another nature. It is true, I ſaid, " that as to the diſcourſes, that paſt between him " and me, and what I had diſliked in his paper, I " thought I was not bound to give an account of " it; for though there is nothing of confeſſion in " the caſe, yet it would look too like a pretending " to merit in me, and a caſting a load on him, that " I thought I could not do it, and therefore begged " to be excuſed, ſince the conferences between a dying " man and a Divine, to whom he particularly opens " himſelf, ſeem to me ſacred things.

" As to all theſe particulars in matters of fact, I " am ready, whenſoever I ſhall be called upon, to " take my oath upon them.

" G. BURNET."

[E] The Lady Ruſſel wrote a letter to his Majeſty . . . to aſſure him, that her huſband was the real Author of the paper delivered to the Sheriff.]

Indorſed by Lady Ruſſel, My letter to the King a few days after my dear Lord's death.

" May it pleaſe your Majeſty,

" I find my huſband's enemies are not appeaſed " with his blood, but ſtil continue to miſrepreſent " him to your Majeſty. 'Tis a great addition to my " ſorrows, to hear your Majeſty is prevailed upon to " beleve, that the paper he delivered to the Sheriffe " at his death was not his own. I can truly ſay, " and am ready in the ſolemneſt manner to atteſt, " that [during his impriſonment *] I often heard " him diſcourſe the chiefeſt matters contained in that " paper in the ſame expreſſions he therein uſes, as " ſome of thoſe few relations, that were admited " to him, can likewiſe averr. And ſure 'tis an ar- " gument of no great force, that ther is a phraſe " or two in it another uſes, when nothing is more " common then to take up ſuch words we like, or " are accuſtomed to in our converſation. I beg " leave further to avow to your Majeſty, that al that " is ſet downe in the paper read to your Majeſty on " Sunday night, to be ſpoken in my preſence, is " exactly true; as I doubt not but the reſt of the " paper is, which was written at my requeſt; and " the Author of it in al his converſation with my " huſband, that I was privy to, ſhowed himſelfe a " loyal ſubject to your Majeſty, a faithful frind to " him, and a moſt tender and conſciencious Miniſter " to his ſoule. I do therefore humbly beg your " Majeſty would be ſo charitable to beleve, that he, " who in al his life was obſerved to act with the " greateſt clearneſſe and ſincerity, would not at the " point of death doe ſo diſingenious and falſe a thing, " as to deliver for his own what was not properly " and expreſsly ſo. And if after the loſſe, in ſuch " a manner, of the beſt huſband in the world, I " were capable of any conſolation, your Majeſty only " could afford it by having better thoughts of him; " which, when I was ſo importunat to ſpeak with " your Majeſty, I thought I had ſom reaſon to be- " leve I ſhould have inclined you to, not upon the " credit of my word, but through the evidence of " what I had to ſay. I hope I have writ nothing " in this, that wil diſpleaſe your Majeſty. If I have, " I humbly beg you to confider it as coming from " a woman amazed with grief; and that you wil " pardon the daughter of a perſon, who ſerved your " Majeſty's father in his greateſt extremityes, [and your " Majeſty in your greateſt poſts *,] and one that is " not conſcious of having ever done any thing " to offend you [before]. I ſhal ever pray for " your Majeſty's long life and happy reign, who am, " with all humility,

" May it pleaſe your Majeſty, &c."

T.

* The words included in the Brackets are croſſed out.

* Theſe words are likewiſe croſſed out.

 This word was alſo croſſed out.

RUSSILIANUS (TIBERIUS), a very ſubtle as well as bold Philoſopher, lived in the 16th Century. He was born in Calabria, and was one of the moſt famous Diſciples of Auguſtin Niphus. He was ſo haſty and paſſionate, that when he diſputed with other ſtudents he uſed ſometimes to fight; for which reaſon Niphus, in a jeſt, which at that time might paſs for wit, called him Turberius (a) inſtead of Tiberius (b). He was ſo ambitious as to imitate Joannes Picus, and perhaps even to ſurpaſs him; for he propoſed, to be publickly diſputed upon, in ſeveral Univerſities of Italy, four hundred propoſitions, taken from almoſt all ſciences (c). This exaſperated the inquiſitors, as they had been at the like attempt of Joannes Picus; and were greatly ſurprized that Ruſſilianus, being ſo young a man, was ſo impudent as to maintain ſeveral opinions which they thought impious [A]. They cauſed him to be proſecuted, which did not terrify

(a) That is, a turbulent perſon.

(b) Auguſt. Niphus de Viro aulico, cap. 59. p. 316.

(c) See Naudæus, in Judicio de Aug. Nipho, p. 40.

[A] The Inquiſitors . . . were greatly ſurprized that Ruſſilianus . . . . was ſo impudent as to maintain ſeveral opinions which they thought impious.] He aſſerted that Chriſt, with regard to the temperature of his body, and the courſe of his life, was ſubject to the influence of the ſtars; that time and the heavens never had any beginning; that the flood under Noah was not a ſingular accident. He revived many of the doctrines of John Picus, which had been condemned, as Gabriel Naudæus affirms. Tam ardenter Pici Mirandulani veſtigiis inſtitiſſe certum eſt, ut non ſecus ac ille, propoſitiones ſupra quadringentas, ex omni ferme ſcientiarum genere ſelectas, publicis in Italiæ Gymnaſiis, diſputandas propoſuerit; ſed invitis tamen ac frementibus, quemadmodum etiam Pico contigerat, ſacris fidei quæſitoribus, qui patienter ferre non poterant, ab hoc tam præcocis ut ſapientiæ, ſic ætatis Philoſopho, Chriſtum quoad ſui corporis temperiem, & vitæ mortiſque hiſtoriam legibus Aſtrorum ſubjici: tempus, & Cœlum, durationis æternæ conſtitui; Inundationem illam univerſalem, quam nos Chriſtiani ſemel dumtaxat accidiſſe contendimus, ſannis, & dicacibus verbis excipi, quaſi certis temporum inclinationibus reverti ſolitam: Cætera denique Placita, quæ dudum à Pico in medium propoſita, temeritatis, & hæreticæ labis damnata fuerant, rurſum in ſcenam, Academicarum concertationum palæſtram, revocari (1). i. e. " It is very certain he trod ſo exactly in Picus Mi- " randula's ſteps, that, in imitation of him, he pro- " poſed upwards of four hundred propoſitions, in " almoſt all ſciences, to be diſputed upon in the uni- " verſities of Italy. This highly exaſperated the " Inquiſitors, (to whom Picus Mirandula alſo had gi- " ven great offence on the like occaſion;) for they " could not bear to hear a Philoſopher, ſo very " young, and of ſo forward an underſtanding, af- " firm that Chriſt, with regard to the diſpoſition or " temperature of his body, and the hiſtory of his life " and death, was ſubject to the power of the ſtars: " that time and the heavens ſhould be aſſerted as of " eternal duration; that the flood, which we Chriſti- " ans declare to have happened but once, ſhould " be laughed at, as a thing that had already happen- " ed at certain ſeaſons. Laſtly, that the reſt of Pi- " cus's doctrines, long ſince propoſed by him, and " condemned as raſh and heretical, ſhould be again " revived, and made a ſubject for academical diſ- " putations." Heidegger accuſes him of aſſerting the opinion of one Henry Mechlinius, a diſciple of

(1) Naudæus, in Judicio de Nipho, p. 40.

(d) Rem. [B] of the first NIPHUS.

terrify him; on the contrary, he had the courage to publiſh a very ſharp apology againſt the Monks [B]. I have quoted elſewhere (d) a ſpeech, in which he introduces philoſophy repreſenting her grievances to Leo X.

Albertus Magnus, viz. that the flood was cauſed by the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn, at the extremity of the ſign Cancer, oppoſite to the conſtellation Argo. Et Mechlinius quidem in Commentariis, quas edidit in magnas Albumaſaris conjunctionis, refert, ſe inveniſſe ex aſtronomicis ſupputationibus, quod Noeticum Diluvium præceſſerit conjunctio quædam Aſtrorum, generalem Aquarum Illuvionem inducens, nimirum Jovis & Saturni in fine Cancri, e regione Argolicæ Navis per quam etiam Arca Noe ſignificatur. Verum hanc Sententiam ſuperiori ſeculo à Tiberio Calabro defenſam refutavit Hieronymus Armellinus Dominicanus, edito peculiari adverſus eum volumine, in quo eam tamquam hæreticam æſtuante ſtomacho damnavit (2). i. e. "Mechlinius, in his commentaries on the great Albumaſar, relates, that he found by aſtronomical calculations, that Noah's flood was preceded by a certain conjunction of the ſtars, which occaſioned the univerſal deluge, viz. the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in the extremity of Cancer, oppoſite to the conſtellation Argo, which alſo denoted Noah's ark. But this opinion, which Tiberius of Calabria defended in the laſt age, was confuted by Jerom Armellinus, a Dominican Frier, in a book he wrote profeſſedly againſt him; and wherein he, in the moſt furious terms, condemns that opinion as heretical."

(2) Heidegger. Hiſt. Patriarch. Exercitat. 17. p. 538. Tom. 1. He ſays the ſame in his diſſertation de Signis cæleſtibus, p. 679.

[B] He had the courage to publiſh a very ſharp apology againſt the Monks.] Here follows another paſſage from Gabriel Naudæus. Quamobrem ſeverius in illum, & diligentius inquirere cæperunt, ſed eo tamen veluti dubiæ pugnæ exitu, ut Tyberius edito adverſus cucullatos Apologetico, talem enim libello ſuo titulum eſſe voluit, & opiniones ſuas liberius quam antea feciſſet propugnaſſe, & acrius ejuſmodi cenſores ſuos, quam rationi conſentaneum eſſet, pupugiſſe videretur (3). i. e. "For this reaſon they began to inform againſt him with greater ſeverity and diligence than before; but Ruffilianus, on the other hand, publiſhed an apology againſt the hooded Friers, for ſuch was the title he gave his book, wherein he defended his own opinions with greater freedom than ever he had done; and ſeemed to have fallen upon his cenſurers in a ſharper manne than was conſiſtent with reaſon."

(3) Naudæus, in Judicio de Niphbo, p. [illegible].

☞ RUST (GEORGE), an excellent Engliſh Writer and Divine in the 17th Century, was educated in Chriſt College in the Univerſity of Cambridge, of which he was Fellow, and where he lived in great eſteem and reputation for his eminent learning and virtues, and was one of the firſt in the Univerſity who overcame the prejudices of the education of the times before the Reſtoration, and was very inſtrumental to enlarge others. He had too great a ſoul for the trifles of that age, and ſaw early the nakedneſs of phraſes and fancies. He out-grew the pretended orthodoxy of thoſe days, and addicted himſelf to the primitive learning and theology, in which he even then became a great maſter (a). In 1651 he delivered in his own Chapel a diſcourſe upon Proverbs xx. 27. [A], which in 1655 he preached at St. Mary's in Cambridge upon John xviii. 38. This piece was firſt publiſhed by Mr. Joſeph Glanvil at London in 1682 in 8vo, under the title of A Diſcourſe of Truth, in a volume entitled, Two choice and uſeful Treatiſes; the one Lux Orientalis: Or an enquiry into the opinion of the Eaſtern Sages concerning the Pre-exiſtence of

(a) Mr. Joſeph Glanvil's Preface to Biſhop Ruſt's Diſcourſe of Truth. Edition London 1682, in 8vo.

[A] A diſcourſe upon Proverbs xx. 27.] In this diſcourſe our Author obſerves (1), that "there are two "things, God and a man's own ſoul, the want of right "apprehenſion whereof is a great foundation both of "thoſe miſapprehenſions, that are concerning the "providences and diſpenſations of God in the world, "and alſo of the looſeneſs and irregularity in the "practices and behaviour of men. For we are to "judge of the truth of our opinions relating to the "providence of God, by their conformity to the na"ture and attributes of God. And therefore if we "have miſapprehenſions of divine attributes and per"fections, we muſt neceſſarily miſtake in divine diſ"penſations. And becauſe every one deſires to be "what his God is, therefore if we misjudge and "miſunderſtand the nature of God, we ſhall be ir"regular and amiſs in our own practices; for we "can never condemn that as a fault in ourſelves, "which we take for a perfection in our God. And "therefore it is rightly brought as one great reaſon "of the wickedneſs of the Heathen, that their Gods "were repreſented to them, as taken with the ſame "luſts and pleaſures, which they themſelves were ſo "much inclined and given up to. So ſome men's "apprehenſions of God lead them to a kind of cru"elty, rigour, and ſevereneſs towards others, and to "the deſire of an exerciſe of arbitrarious power and "dominion over them, even in things mental and "intellectual. And as wrong apprehenſions of God's "nature, ſo alſo miſconceits of the nature of the "ſoul, and its operations, muſt needs cauſe miſtakes "concerning the great providences of God, which "relate to the minds of men. For it being agreeable "to the wiſdom and goodneſs of God, to deal "with us in a way ſuitable to our faculties, and the "principles of our conſtitution; if we miſtake here, "we ſhall neceſſarily conceive amiſs of thoſe diſ"penſations of God, which concern the govern"ment of us, in reference to our minds and under"ſtandings. And farther, becauſe every being doth "act ſuitably to its principles; therefore voluntary "agents, if they do not rightly underſtand the nature "and diſpenſations of their powers and faculties, "what objects and operations are thereto proportion"ed, will certainly neglect the attempting of ſuch "objects, and the exerciſe of ſuch actions, which "they do not conceive to be in their ſphere and ca"pacity." He then remarks, that the meaning of the text in Prov. xx. 27. is, that the ſoul of man is, as it were, a candle lighted and ſet by God, to ſearch into, and take notice of all the ſecrets, which are inwombed in man, his thoughts, deſires, affections, &c. And he enquires, 1. What is meant by the Candle of the Lord? 2. What is meant by the Spirit of Man? 3. How the Spirit of Man is the Candle of the Lord? With regard to the firſt, he obſerves, that by the Candle of the Lord is meant nothing elſe but Truth; for Truth is the light of the intellectual world. Truth, ſays he, is twofold: Truth in things, which you may call Truth in the objects; and Truth in the underſtanding, which is truth in the ſubject. By the firſt, ſays he (2), I mean nothing elſe, but that things neceſſarily are what they are; and that there are neceſſary mutual reſpects and relations of things one unto another. Now that things are what they are, and that there are mutual reſpects and relations, eternal and immutable, and in order of nature antecedent to any underſtanding, either created or uncreated, is a thing very plain and evident. For it is clearer than the meridian light, that ſuch propoſitions as theſe, Homo eſt Animal rationale; Triangulum eſt quod habet tres angulos, are not arbitrarious dependences upon the will, decree, or underſtanding of God, but are neceſſary and eternal truths, and wherein it is as impoſſible to divide the ſubject, and what is ſpoken of it, as it is for a thing not to be what it is; which is no leſs than a contradiction. And as indiſpenſable are the mutual

(1) See The Remains of Dr. George Ruſt, late Lord Biſhop of Dromore, in the Kingdom of Ireland. Collected and publiſhed by Henry Hallywell, p. 21. London 1686, in 4to.

(2) Ibid. p. 23.

of ſouls: being a Key to unlock the grand Myſteries of Providence in relation to Man's Sin and Miſery. The other, A diſcourſe of Truth, by the late Reverend Dr. Ruſt, Lord Biſhop of Dromere in Ireland. With Annotations on them both. The Annotations are ſuppoſed to be written by Dr. Henry More. Mr. Glanvil in his Preface obſerves with regard to this mutual reſpects and relations of things, both in ſpeculatives and morals. For can it be imagined, that every argument can be made a proportioned medium, to prove every concluſion? That any thing may be a ſuitable means to every end? That any object may be conformable to any faculty? Can Omnipotence itſelf make theſe propoſitions, that twice two are four, or that parallels cannot interſect, clear and convincing arguments to prove thoſe grand truths, That Chriſt came into the world to die for ſinners, and is now exalted as a Prince and Saviour at the right hand of God? Is it poſſible that there ſhould be ſuch a kind of Geometry, wherein any problems ſhould be demonſtrated by any principles, quidlibet ex quolibet, as that a quadrangle is that, which is comprehended of four right lines; therefore the three angles of a triangle are not equal to two right ones? Can the infinite wiſdom itſelf make the damning of all the innocent and the unſpotted Angels in Heaven, a proportionate means to declare and manifeſt the unmeaſurableneſs of his grace, and love, and goodneſs towards them? Can lying, ſwearing, envy, malice, nay hatred of God and goodneſs itſelf, be made the moſt acceptable ſervice of God, and the readieſt way to a man's happineſs? And yet all theſe muſt be true, and infinitely more ſuch contradictions than we can poſſibly imagine, if the mutual reſpects and relations of things be not eternal and indiſpenſable. Which that they are, our Author endeavours to prove; in order to which he premiſes, that "divine underſtanding cannot be "the fountain of the truth of things, nor the foun- "dation of the references one to another; for it is "againſt the nature of all underſtanding to make "its objects. It is the nature of underſtanding, ut "moveatur, illuminetur, formetur, &c. of its object, ut "moveat, illuminet, formet. Intellectus in actu primo "hath itſelf unto its object, as the eye unto the ſun; "it is irradiated, enlightened, and actuated by it. "And Intellectus in actu ſecundo hath itſelf unto its "object, as the image to that it repreſents; and the "perfection of underſtanding conſiſts in being actuat- "ed by and in an adequate conformity to its ob- "ject, according to the nature of all ideas, images, "or repreſentations of things. The ſum is this: "no ideas or repreſentations are or make the things "they repreſent; all underſtanding is ſuch; there- "fore no underſtanding doth make the natures, "reſpects, and relations of its objects. It remains "then, that abſolute, arbitrarious, and independent "will muſt be the fountain of all truth, and muſt "determine the references and dependences of things; "which aſſertion would in the firſt place deſtroy the "nature of God, and rob him of his attributes. "For then it is impoſſible that there ſhould be ſuch "a thing as divine wiſdom and knowledge, which "is nothing elſe but an apprehenſion of common "notions, and the natures and mutual reſpects and "relations of things. For if the nature of God be "ſuch, that his arbitrarious imagination, that ſuch "and ſuch things have ſuch and ſuch natures and "dependences, doth make thoſe things to have thoſe "natures and dependences, he may as eaſily unima- "gine that imagination; and then they that before "had a mutual harmony, ſymphony, and agree- "ment with one another, ſhall now ſtand at a great "diſtance and oppoſition. And thus the divine un- "derſtanding will be a mere Protean Chimæra, a ca- "ſual conflux of intellectual atoms. Contradictions "are true, if God will underſtand them ſo; and "then the foundation of all knowledge is taken away, "and God may as truly be ſaid to know nothing as "every thing; nay, an angel or man may as truly "be ſaid to know all things, as God himſelf; for "then every thing will be alike certain, and every "apprehenſion equally conformable to truth. Theſe "are infallible conſequences, and a thouſand more "as abſurd as theſe, if contradictory propoſitions "may be both true; and whether they be ſo or no, "it is a mere caſual dependence upon the arbitrarious "pleaſure of God, if there be not a neceſſary immu- "tability and eternal oppoſition betwixt the being "and not being of the ſame thing, at the ſame time, "and in the ſame reſpect. Likewiſe all thoſe truths "we call Common Notions, (the ſyſtem and compre- "henſion of which is the very eſſence of divine "wiſdom) as the concluſions iſſuing from them, "not by any operoſe deduction, but a clear intuitive "light, are the very nature of divine knowledge, "(if we diſtinguiſh thoſe two attributes in God;) I "ſay, all theſe propoſitions of immediate and inde- "monſtrable truth, if theſe be only ſo, becauſe ſo "underſtood by God, and ſo underſtood by God, be- "cauſe he pleaſed to have them, and not becauſe "there is an indiſpenſable relation of harmony and "proportion betwixt the terms themſelves; then it "is a thing merely caſual, and at the pleaſure of "God to change his former apprehenſions and ideas "of thoſe truths, and to make their contradicto- "ries as evident, radical, and fundamental as them- "ſelves but even now were; and ſo divine wiſdom "and knowledge will be a various, fickle, and muta- "ble thing, a mere tumult and confuſion. All "theſe conſequences infallibly flow from this cer- "tain principle, that upon a changeable and uncer- "tain cauſe, effects muſt needs have a changeable and "uncertain dependence. And there is nothing ima- "ginable in itſelf more changeable and uncertain "than a will not regulated by the dictates of reaſon "and underſtanding. If any deny theſe conſequen- "ces and deductions, becauſe they ſuppoſe that God "is mutable and changeable; I anſwer, by bring- "ing this as another abſurdity, that if there be no "indiſpenſable and eternal reſpects of things, it "will rob God of his immutability and unchange- "ableneſs. For if there be no neceſſary dependence "betwixt unchangeableneſs and perfection, what "ſhould hinder, but that if God pleaſe to think ſo, "it will be a perfection to be changeable? And if "will, as ſuch, be the only principle of his actions, "it is infallibly his perfection to be ſo. For it is "the perfection of every Being to act according to "the principle of its nature; and it is the nature of "an arbitrarious principle to act or not, to do or "undo upon no account but its own will and plea- "ſure: to be determined and tied up, either by it- "ſelf or from abroad, is violent and contranatural."

He tells us then (3), that to deny the mutual reſpects and (3) p. 27.
Rationes Rerum to be immutable and indiſpenſable, will ſpoil God of that univerſal rectitude, which is the greateſt perfection of his nature. For then juſtice, faithfulneſs, mercy, goodneſs, &c. will be but contingent and arbitrarious iſſues of the divine will. This is a clear and undeniable conſequence. For if you ſay, theſe be indiſpenſable perfections in God; for inſtance, if Juſtice be ſo, then there is an eternal relation of right and equity betwixt every Being, and the giving of it that which is its propriety; if Faithfulneſs, then there is an indiſpenſable agreement betwixt a promiſe and the performance of it; if Mercy, then there is an immutable and unalterable ſuitableneſs and harmony between an indigent creature, and pity and commiſeration; if Goodneſs, then there is an everlaſting proportion and ſymmetry between fulneſs and its overflowing and diſpreading of itſelf, which yet is the thing denied. For to ſay they are indiſpenſably ſo, becauſe God underſtands them ſo, ſeems to me extreme incogitancy; for that is againſt the nature of all underſtanding, which is but the idea and repreſentation of things, and is then a true and perfect image, when it is exactly conformed to its object. And therefore if things have not mutual reſpects and relations eternal and indiſpenſable, then all thoſe perfections do ſolely and purely depend upon abſolute and independent will, as will; and conſequently it was and is indifferent in itſelf, that the contrary to theſe, as injuſtice, unfaithfulneſs, cruelty, malice, hatred, ſpite, revenge, fury, and whatever goes to the conſtitution of Hell itſelf, ſhould have been made this Diſcourſe of Truth, that " the ſubject of it is of vaſt moment, and the truth aſſerted " in it with an irreſiſtible ſtrength and force of reaſoning; and not to be convinced by " it, will argue either great weakneſs of underſtanding, in not perceiving conſequences, " that are ſo cloſe and plain; or great obſtinacy of will, in being ſhut up by prejudices " and preconceived opinions againſt light, that is ſo clear and manifeſt." It was reprinted the top and higheſt perfections of the Divine Nature; which is ſuch blaſphemy, as cannot well be named without horror and trembling. For inſtead of being a God, ſuch a nature as this is, joined with Omnipotency, would be a worſe Devil than any in Hell. And yet this is a neceſſary and infallible conſequence from the denial of theſe mutual reſpects and relations of things unto one another, to be eternal and unchangeable. He remarks then (4), that " as by the denial of theſe the nature of " God is wholly deſtroyed, ſo in the ſecond place " the mind of man would have no certainty of " knowledge, or aſſurance of happineſs. He can " never come to know there is a God, and conſe- " quently not the will and mind of God, which if " there be no intrinſecal and indiſpenſable reſpects " and relations of things, muſt be the ground and " foundation of all knowledge; for what means or " arguments ſhould we uſe to find out or prove a Di- " vine Nature? It were folly and madneſs to ſit down " and conſider the admirable contrivement and arti- " fice of this great fabrick of the Univerſe; how that " all natural things ſeem to act for ſome end, though " themſelves take no cognizance of it; how the " ſun by its motion and ſituation, or (which is all " one) by being a centre of the earth's motion, pro- " vides light, and heat, and life for this inferior " world; how living creatures bring forth a moſt " apt compoſure and ſtructure of parts, and with that " a Being endued with admirable faculties, and yet " themſelves have no inſight into, nor conſultation " about this incomparable workmanſhip; how they " are furniſhed with powers and inclinations for the " preſervation of the body, when it is once brought " into the world; how without previous deliberation " they naturally take in that food, which without " their intention or animadverſion is concocted in " their ventricle, turned into chyle, that chyle into " blood, that blood diffuſed through the veins and ar- " teries, and therewith the ſeveral members nouriſh- " ed, and decays of ſtrength repaired; I ſay, the " gathering from all theſe, (which one would think " were a very natural conſequence) that there is a " wiſe principle, which directs all theſe Beings un- " known to you, in their ſeveral motions, to their " ſeveral ends, (ſuppoſing the dependence and rela- " tions of things to be contingent and arbitrarious) " were a piece of folly and incogitancy. For how " can the order of thoſe things ſpeak a wiſe and un- " derſtanding Being, which have no relation or re- " ſpect unto one another, but their whole agreement, " ſuitableneſs, and proportion, is a mere caſual " iſſue of abſolute and independent will? If any " thing may be the cauſe of any effect, and a pro- " portionate mean to any end, who can infer infinite " wiſdom from the dependence of things, and their " relations to one another? For we are to know, that " there is a God, and the will of that God, before " we can know the mutual harmony or diſproportion " of things; and yet if we do not know theſe prin- " cipal reſpects, that things have among themſelves, " it is impoſſible we ſhould ever come to the know- " ledge of a God. For theſe are the only arguments, " that any logic in the world can make uſe of to " prove any concluſion. But ſuppoſe we ſhould come " to know that there is a God, which, as I have " demonſtrated, denying the neceſſary and immuta- " ble truth of common notions, and the indiſpenſa- " ble and eternal relations of things, is altogether " impoſſible; however, let it be ſuppoſed, yet how " ſhall we know, that theſe common notions and " principles of natural inſtinct, which are the foun- " dation of all diſcourſe and argumentation, are " certain and infallible truths, and that our ſenſes, " (which, with theſe former principles, we ſuppoſe " this divine nature to have given us to converſe " with this outward world) were not on purpoſe be- " ſtowed upon us, to befool, delude, and cheat us, " if we be not firſt aſſured of the veracity of God? " And how can we be aſſured of that, if we know " not that veracity is a perfection? And how ſhall " we know it is ſo, unleſs there be an intrinſecal " relation betwixt veracity and perfection? For if " it be an arbitrarious reſpect depending upon the " will of God, there is no way poſſibly left whereby " we ſhould come to know, that it is in God at all. " And therefore we have fully as much reaſon to be- " lieve, that all our common notions and principles " of natural inſtinct, whereupon we ground all our " reaſonings and diſcourſe, are mere chimæras to " delude and abuſe our faculties, and all thoſe ideas, " phantaſms, and apprehenſions of our external ſenſes, " we imagine are occaſioned in us by the preſence " of outward objects, are mere ſpectrums and " gulleries, wherewith poor mortals are befooled and " cheated; as that they are given us by the firſt " goodneſs and truth to lead us into the knowledge " of himſelf and nature. This is a clear and evi- " dent conſequence, and cannot be denied by any " that doth not complain of darkneſs in the brighteſt " and moſt meridian light. And here you have the " foundation of the higheſt ſcepticiſm; for who can " ſay he knows any thing, when he hath no baſis, " on which he can raiſe any true concluſion? . . . . " Here you have likewiſe the true foundations of " that we call Rantiſm; for if there be no diſtinction " betwixt truth and falſhood, good and evil, in the " nature of the things themſelves, and we can never " be aſſured what is the mind and pleaſure of the ſu- " preme abſolute will, (becauſe veracity is not in- " trinſecally, and ex naturâ Rei a perfection, but only " an arbitrarious, if any attribute in the Deity) then " it infallibly follows, that it is all one what I do, " or how I live; and I have as much reaſon to be- " lieve, that I am as pleaſing to God, when I give " myſelf up into all filthineſs, uncleanneſs, and ſin, " when I ſwell with pride, envy, hatred, malice, " &c. as when I endeavour with all my might and " ſtrength to purge and purify my ſoul from all pollu- " tion and defilement both of fleſh and ſpirit; and " when I purſue the mortification of all my carnal " luſts and inclinations. And I have fully as much " ground and aſſurance, that the one is the ready " way to happineſs as the other." And this is another branch of this ſecond abſurdity, from the denial of the intrinſecal and eternal reſpects and relations of things, that a man would not have any aſſurance of future happineſs. For though it be true indeed, or at leaſt we fancy to ourſelves, that God hath ſent Jeſus Chriſt into the world, and by him hath made very large and ample promiſes, that whoſoever believes in him, and conforms his life unto his precepts, ſhall be made heir of the ſame inheritance and glory, which Chriſt is now poſſeſſed of and inveſted with in the Kingdom of his Father; yet what ground have we to believe, that God does not intend only to play with and abuſe our faculties, and in concluſion to damn all thoſe that believe and live as is above expreſſed, and to take them only into the enjoyments of heaven and happineſs, who have been the great oppoſers of the truth and goſpel, and life, and nature of Jeſus Chriſt in the world? For if there be no intrinſecal evil in deceiving and falſifying, in the damning the good, or ſaving obſtinate and contumacious ſinners, (whilſt ſuch) notwithſtanding any promiſes or threatnings to the contrary; and if the things be in themſelves indifferent, it is an unadviſed confidence to pronounce determinately on either ſide. Yea, farther, ſuppoſe we ſhould be aſſured, that God is verax, and that the ſcripture doth declare what is his mind and pleaſure; yet if there be not an intrinſecal oppoſition betwixt the Being and not Being of a thing at the ſame time, and in the ſame reſpect; then God can make a thing, that hath been done undone, and that whatever hath been done or ſpoken, either by himſelf, or Chriſt, or his Apoſtles, ſhould never be done or ſpoken by him or them; though he hath come into the world, yet he ſhould not printed by Mr. Henry Hallywell with the addition of two Prefaces [B], among our Author's Remains, at London in 1686 in 4to. In 1656 our Author performed an exerciſe upon this ſubject, Meſſias in S. Scripturâ promiſſus olim venit, in the Divinity-ſchools at Cambridge, publiſhed by Mr. Hallywell among his Remains, who in his Preface to them obſerves, that in this piece we have a ſolid and rational refutation of all the cavils and exceptions, which the greateſt and moſt learned Rabbins of the Jews could invent to invalidate the force of thoſe predictions, which the Chriſtians urge againſt them, to prove that the promiſed Meſſiah is long ſince come. And by this we gain thus much, that ſince the objections of the naſuteſt Jews are ſo weak, and their exceptions againſt thoſe prophecies the Author here makes uſe of ſo very trifling and frivolous, and that they are at ſo great an uncertainty among themſelves both as to the perſon and the time of the Meſſiah's coming, it is a very ſtrong confirmation of us Chriſtians in the belief of this great article of our faith, that our Jeſus is really the promiſed Meſſiah, and that the Jews themſelves ought to have received him as ſuch, and ſubmitted themſelves to his laws, as the Son of God and the King of Iſrael. In 1658 our Author preached at St. Mary's in Cambridge a diſcourſe upon 1 John iv. 16. [C], and the ſame year he anſwered the Divinity Act on Commencement Tueſday, upon not be come; though he hath made theſe promiſes, yet that they ſhould not be made; though God hath given us faculties, that are capable of the enjoyment of himſelf, yet that he ſhould not have given them us; and that we ſhould have no Being, nor think a thought, while we fancy and ſpeak of all theſe contradictions. In fine, it were impoſſible, we ſhould know any thing, if the application of contradictory terms depend upon the arbitrarious reſolves of any being whatſoever. If any ſhould affirm, that the terms of common notions have an eternal and indiſpenſable relation unto one another, and deny it of other truths, he exceedingly betrays his folly and incogitancy. For theſe common notions and principles are foundations and radical truths, upon which are built all the deductions of reaſon and diſcourſe, and with which, ſo far as they have any truth in them, they are inſeparably united.

(4) p. 28.

[B] Reprinted by Mr. Henry Hallywell with the addition of two Prefaces.] One of theſe Prefaces is added to his edition of the Diſcourſe upon Prov. xx. 27. The other is the Preface to it, as it was delivered at St. Mary's in Cambridge in 1655 upon John xviii. 38. This Preface is finely written, and is as follows. " What is truth? Pilate's queſtion hath always been " the great enquiry of the world, but eſpecially in " theſe days of ours, when to doubt of all things be- " gins to be a principle in Divinity as well as Philo- " ſophy. The foundations, that men have ſo long " built their opinions and faith upon, are ſhaken and " ſtaggered in this ſceptical age. Every one upon " a particular and ſeveral ſect is in queſt after truth; " and ſo fooliſh and full of vain affectation is the " mind of man, that each one confidently believes " himſelf in the right; and however others call " themſelves, that he and thoſe of his party are the " only orthodox. Should we go abroad in the world, " and aſk as many as we meet, What is truth? we " ſhould find it a changeable and uncertain notion, " which every one cloaths his own apprehenſions " with. Truth is in every ſect and party, though " they ſpeak inconſiſtencies among themſelves, and " contradictions to one another. Truth is the Turkiſh " Alcoran, the Jewiſh Talmud, the Papiſts Councils, " the Proteſtants Catechiſms and models of Divinity; " each of theſe in their proper place and region. Truth " is a various uncertain thing, changes with the air " and climate. It is Mahomet at Conſtantinople, " the Pope at Rome, Luther at Wittemberg, Calvin " at Geneva, Arminius at Oldwater, Socinus at Cra- " cow; and each of theſe are ſound and orthodox " in the circuit of their own region and dominion. " And as it is mutable according to places, ſo alſo " according to the ages of the world. It was one " while Arianiſm under ſeveral Emperors, in ſeveral " Councils, among ſeveral fathers. It was for ſome " hundreds of years a company of foppiſh and ridi- " culous ſuperſtitions and ceremonies, pardons and " indulgencies, redemptions from purgatory, and the " like. And we know in our days into what new " ſhapes this Proteus hath transformed itſelf. Truth, " it is worm-eaten antiquity, an infallible chair, the " ſtrongeſt lungs, the longeſt ſword, the moſt voices. " Truth is confident ignorance, aſſiſted with heady " and turbulent Zeal, and backt with mercileſs per- " ſecution of all gainſayers. It is preſumptuous in- " cogitancy, accompanied with rigid and uncharita- " ble cenſures of all diſſenting judgments. It is a " confeſſion of faith, with an Anathema at the foot " of every article. It is that which confutes opi- " nions, and anſwers arguments by branding them " with names of reproach and ſcandal. It is a " ſtandard meaſure in the hands of ſome particular " ſect, to which all men's underſtandings muſt be " evened and ſquared. It is a State-mould commit- " ted to the keeping of ſome party, that is in the " greateſt favour; whereinto all opinions are caſt; " and thoſe that are beyond its capacity, are reject- " ed as droſs." In a word, truth is a piece of education, intereſt, humour, fancy, and temper: it is that we are born to, ſuck in with our mothers milk, learn with our A B C. It is an inveterate prejudice, that is bred in our minds, which all arguments, that can be brought to the contrary, do irritate, but not convince: it is an opinion firſt taken up, and then reaſon ſought out to maintain it. Truth, it is that which ſerves every man's turn or intereſt; it is the ſureſt and ſtrongeſt ſide; it is that which ſecures a man's eſtate, liberty and outward advantages; it is that which ſaves a man the coſt and expence of ſelf-denial and patience under the reproach and perſecution of a prevailing ſect; it is that which leads the way to applauſe and preferment, and gives the pompous title of ſound in the Faith, that is, in the opinion of the place and Church, where one lives. Otherwiſe, Truth is a piece of humourſome ſingularity; the man is unwilling to go with a multitude, or truſt himſelf in a crowd, leſt he be loſt, forgotten, and not taken notice of. It is a deſire to appear μέγας τις, the Author of ſome new diſcoveries; the head and father of a particular ſect. It is a piece of over-weening pride, of fond ſelf-flattery and conceit, that thinks itſelf wiſer than the Church, where it lives, and all the world beſides. Many times again, Truth is nothing elſe but the boilings of an heated and melancholic, of an unwieldy and untamed fancy; and hence ſpring moſt of the new lights of the preſent age. Truth to theſe men is a bundle of empty and airy words, that ſound well, but have no ſenſe; it is a company of non-ſignificant phraſes handſomly put together; it is a ſeraphic and myſtical nonſenſe; a diſcourſe made up of high-flown expreſſions, to which there anſwers no repreſentation or idea in the mind. Once more; Truth is a piece of temper and complection; it is light in a coloured glaſs, diverſified according to the diſpoſitions of men; it is the ſeveral tinctures of men's paſſions and affections; it is cruelty in rigid and ſevere, it is fond indulgence in ſoft and effeminate natures; it is that which beſt gratifies a man's luſts and corruptions. " But is this " the beſt repreſentation can be made of Truth? " Surely no. Truth is the firſt-begotten of the Divine " goodneſs; it is the life and nature of the ſecond " hypoſtaſis in the Deity; it is the ſun of the in- " tellectual world, that rays into pure and holy and " unprejudiced ſouls, and fills them with joy and " happineſs; it is the higheſt accompliſhment next " to goodneſs and righteouſneſs, that our minds and " underſtandings are capable of. It will not be " amiſs therefore to make a ſtricter enquiry and " ſearch into its nature, and to give a more particu- " lar anſwer to Pilate's queſtion, What is Truth?

[C] A diſcourſe upon 1 John iv. 16.] In this diſcourſe he obſerves (5), that God is nothing elſe but Ens ſummè perfectum; and Goodneſs is the flower and ſum- upon this queſtion, Fore Reſurrectionem Corporis ſuadet Scriptura, nec refragatur Ratio; but Dr. Ruſt's poſition upon this ſubject was not come to the hands of Mr. Hallywell, when he publiſhed his Remains. Beſides theſe tracts of our Author, we have A Diſcourſe of the uſe of Reaſon in matters of Religion; ſhewing that Chriſtianity contains nothing repugnant to right Reaſon, againſt Enthuſiaſts and Deiſts: written in Latin by our Author, and tranſlated into Engliſh with Annotations upon it by Mr. Henry Hallywell. Upon the Reſtoration, Biſhop Taylor, foreſeeing the vacancy in the Deanery of Connor in Ireland, ſent to Cambridge for ſome learned and ingenious man, who might be fit for that Dignity. The motion was made to Dr. Ruſt, which correſponding with the great inclination he had to be converſant with that incomparable perſon, he gladly accepted of it, and haſtened to Ireland [D], and landed at Dublin about Auguſt 1661. He was received with great kindneſs and reſpect by Biſhop Taylor, and preferred to the Deanery as ſoon as it was void, which was ſhortly after. Upon the Biſhop's death, Auguſt 13 1667, he preached his Funeral Sermon, which was printed. The Biſhopricks were now divided; Dr. Boyle, Dean of Cork, was nominated Biſhop of Downe and Connor, and Dr. Ruſt, Dean of Connor, Biſhop of Dromore, in which he continued till his death, which was occaſioned by a fever in Dec. 1670, and was interred in the Choir of the Cathedral of Dromore in a vault made for hisp redeceſſor Biſhop Taylor, whoſe body was depoſited there (b). Mr. Glanvil, who was very particularly acquainted with him, tells us, that he was a man of a clear mind, a deep judgment, and ſearching wit, greatly learned in all the beſt ſorts of knowledge, old and new, a thoughtful and diligent enquirer, of a free underſtanding and vaſt capacity, joined with ſingular modeſty and unuſual ſweetneſs of temper, which made him the darling of all that knew him. He was a perſon of great piety and generoſity, a hearty lover of God and man, an excellent Preacher, a wiſe Governor, a profound Philoſopher, a cloſe Reaſoner, and above all, a true and exemplary Chriſtian. In ſhort, he was one, who had all the qualifications of a primitive Biſhop, and of an extraordinary man.

(5) Remains, p. 9.

(b) Mr. Joſeph Glanvil's Preface to Biſhop Ruſt's Diſcourſe of Truth. Edition London 1682, in 8vo.

ſummity, nay more, the root and original of all perfection. Socrates in Plato's Sympoſion ſaith concerning love, that it is πρισβύταλος καὶ τιμιώτατος Θεῶν, or ſimple goodneſs is the firſt hypoſtaſis in the Platonic Triad; and the Apoſtle tells us, that love is the fulfilling of the law; and all moral excellencies are contained in it by way of eminency and tranſcendency, and (as he ſaith) in the ſuper-eſſential cauſes. Goodneſs is the richeſt and moſt eſſential attribute of the Divine Nature, which if you take from God, you rob him of the Deity. And all other perfections are only ſo far morally ſuch, as they partake of this, and are ſerviceable thereunto. Juſtice, that gives to every one his right and due, is ſo far only commendable, as it communicates with goodneſs; for ſummum Jus ſumma Injuria; and ſtrict juſtice many times borders upon cruelty, at leaſt it is no perfection to exact it. Even this goodneſs it is that enſtamps upon all the notion of perfection; the partaking or not partaking of goodneſs makes all things undergo divers cenſures. Even power and wiſdom disjoined from goodneſs; what is it but ſubtile miſchief, and armed wickedneſs? And all perfections whatever are only ſo far good and deſirable, as they are found built on this foundation. Let there be a Being of infinite ſubtilty and cunning, that can contrive ways, and carry on deſigns; and let it have almighty power, that can compaſs and bring to paſs whatever it would, and let it be, as to its ſubſiſtence, immutable and immenſe; yet if you add to its being principles of envy and malice, it will be ſo far from deſerving the name of Good, that it will be a worſe devil than hell itſelf can ſhew . . . Goodneſs is the moſt high and eſſential perfection of the Deity. God is no narrow, contracted, ſelfiſh being, carries on no deſigns and particular intereſts of his own. That is a piece of beggarly policy, that becomes not an all-ſufficient Being. The cauſe, which God alone manages in the world, is the cauſe of Goodneſs, Righteouſneſs, Equity, and Juſtice, and whatever hath any thing of beauty and comlineſs in it. God is a Being neither fond nor cruel, nor dotes upon any, but only intends this, that all things may be ordered and diſpoſed according to the laws of Eternal Goodneſs, Wiſdom, and Rectitude.

[D] Haſtened to Ireland.] Dr. John Worthington in a letter to Mr. Samuel Hartlib, dated April the 19th 1661, writes thus (6): "Mr. Ruſt (whom Mr. Brere-
" ton knows, and you know him by his MS.) is go" ing over into Ireland to be Dean of Downe, being " invited thither by Dr. Taylor the Biſhop; and " Mr. Marſh (ſometime my Pupil, and Fellow of " Caius College) is there already, and made Dean
" of Armagh. They are both excellent perſons, and " preferred to theſe places by the care of the above-
" mentioned Biſhop." T.

(6) Miſcellanies, p. 245. edit. London 1704, in 8vo.

RUTILIA, a Roman Lady, ſiſter to the Publius Rutilius who ſubmitted ſo patiently to his unjuſt baniſhment, and wife of Marcus Aurelius Cotta, had a moſt deſerving ſon, whom ſhe tenderly loved, and whoſe death ſhe bore very couragiouſly (a). Seneca propoſed her as an example for others [A]. Cicero would have done the ſame; but not (a) See near the cloſe of the rem. [A].

[A] Seneca propoſed her as an example for others.] In the book he wrote during his exile, to conſole his excellent mother, he exhorts her to imitate, among other couragious ladies, our Rutilia. Rutilia ſays he (1), Cottam filium ſecuta eſt in exſilium, & uſque eo fuit indulgentia conſtricta, ut mallet exſilium pati, quam deſiderium: nec ante in patriam, quam cum filio rediit. Eumdem jam reducem, & in Rep. florentem tam fortiter amiſit, quam ſecuta eſt: nec quiſquam lacrimas ejus poſt elatum filium notavit. In expulſo virtutem oſtendit, in amiſſo prudentiam, nam & nihil illam à pietate deterruit, & nihil in triſtitia ſupervacua ſtultaque detinuit. Cum his te numerari fœminis volo, quarum vitam ſemper imitata es, &c. i. e. "Rutilia followed her ſon into exile;
" and, ſo great was her fondneſs, that ſhe choſe to
" ſuffer baniſhment rather than live without him;
" nor did ſhe return to her country till he came back
" with her to it. She bore with as much courage his " death, after his return and proſperity, as ſhe had " ſhewed bravery in following him; nor did any per-
" ſon obſerve her to weep at his funeral. She mani-
" feſted her courage when he was in exile, and her
" wiſdom when he died: for as, in the former, ſhe
" could not be deterred from diſcovering her piety;
" ſo, in the latter, nothing could make her indulge
" a ſilly ſuperfluous grief. Now I would have you " rank'd among theſe women, whoſe life has always " been your pattern." I am ſure the Reader will permit me, on this occaſion, to extract a paſſage from Father Senault's treatiſe on the uſe of the paſſions, in that part of it where he explains the characteriſticks of deſire. "Baniſhment is doubtleſs one of the moſt
" cruel puniſhments that Judges have invented, to " puniſh the guilty. It ſeparates us from every thing
" we love; and it ſeems to be a long death, which " leaves us only a ſmall portion of life, to make us
" ſtill

(1) Seneca, de Conſolatione ad Helviam, cap. 16. p. m. 787.

not being ſufficiently acquainted with the particulars of that incident, he enquired of Pomponius Atticus about it, but the latter could not give him the neceſſary informations concerning it [B]. As the work (b) in which he intended to introduce our Rutilia is loſt, we do not know whether he procured all the informations he wanted; and whether he really ſpoke of her, though it is very probable he did. A ſingular circumſtance is, it is ſaid that he enquired about ſome particulars which had before been publiſhed by him in his works (c); a circumſtance which would ſhew, that even eminent Authors forget incidents they had publiſhed.

(b) In his book de Conſolatione.

(c) See the rem. [B].

" ſtill more miſerable. Nevertheleſs there was a mo" ther, who choſe to ſuffer the rigours of this tor-
" ment, rather than the pangs of deſire; and who " would follow her ſon into baniſhment, in order that
" ſhe might not be condemned to regret his abſence,
" and wiſh his return." But who told Father Senault, that the accompanying her ſon would free her from the pain of wiſhing his return to Rome? By the way, Rutilia's ſon was named Caius Aurelius Cotta. He was a good Orator (2); was ſent into baniſhment during the diſcord between Marius and Sylla, and returned to Rome when the party of the latter was triumphant there. He was Conſul in the year of Rome 678. He probably died of a wound two years after, that bled afreſh; and which deprived him of the honour of the triumph that was decreed for him (3). He is not Cotta, one of the interlocutors in Tully's books de Natura Deorum, as is affirmed by Glandorpius (4.

(2) Cicero, de Oratore, lib. 1. cap. 8. and in Bruto, cap. 30. See Corradus, in Brutum Ciceronis, p. 310 & ſeq.

(3) See Sigonius, in Faſtis Conſul. ad ann. 678, 680.

(4) Glandorp. Onomaſt. p. 144.

[B] He enquired of Pomponius Atticus about it, but he could not give him the neceſſary informations concerning it.] He wanted to know whether Rutilia died before or after her ſon. Rutilia vivo ne C. Cotta filio ſuo mortua ſit, an mortuo? Pertinent ad eum librum quem de luctu minuendo ſcripſimus (5). i. e. " Whether Rutilia died " while her ſon Cotta was living, or after him? " Theſe particulars belong to the book I wrote con- " cerning the motives of aſſwaging grief." In another book he writes as follows; de Rutilia, quoniam videris dubitare, ſcribes ad me cum ſcies, ſed quam primum (6). i. e. " As you ſeem to be in doubt with regard to " Rutilia, write to me as ſoon as you are fully ſatisfied " about it; but with all the expedition poſſible." Corradus's note is ſo curious, that I cannot forbear tranſcribing it. Mortuo mortua eſt . . . . quod mirum Ciceronem quæſiſſe, quum in libris oratoriis jampridem ſcripſiſſet Cottam ipſum ſibi ſermonem illum retuliſſe: quin Atticus etiam dubitabat, quum tamen uterque & Cottam & Rutiliam vidiſſet (7). i. e. " She died after him . . . . " I am ſurprized Cicero ſhould aſk ſuch a queſtion, " ſince he himſelf had long before ſaid, in his books " on Rhetorick, that Cotta himſelf had told him ſo. " But we find that Atticus himſelf was dubious about " it, though he and Cicero had ſeen Cotta and Ru- " tilia."

(5) Cicero, Epiſt. 20. lib. 12. ad Atticum.

(6) Idem. Epiſt. 22. ejuſd. libri.

(7) Corradus, in Epiſt. 20. lib. 12. ad Atticum, p. 328. edit. Græviana.

RUYSBROECK (JOHN DE), in Latin Ruſbrochius, was ſo called, becauſe he was born in the Village of Ruyſbroeck, in Brabant, between Bruſſels and Hall. He was firſt Curate, and afterwards Rector of St. Gedula's Church in Bruſſels; and afterwards Founder and Prior of a Monaſtery of Canons Regular of St. Auſtin, at Groendal, in the Foreſt of Seignies, two leagues from Bruſſels; and laſtly, Reformer of the Order throughout the Low Countries (a). He was an ignorant man, but very devout [A], contemplative, and altogether internal; and went ſo far into the depths of myſtical divinity, that he is looked upon as one of the greateſt maſters in that ſcience. He has been called a ſecond Dionyſius Areopagita (b). He wrote ſeveral books in the Flemiſh tongue, the manuſcripts of which are preſerved in the Monaſtery of Groendal; with a Latin tranſlation of ſome of them by William Jordan, Contemporary and of the ſame Order of our Author (c). It is concluded from his ignorance, that he muſt be ranked among thoſe who have writ by inſpiration (d). There is a Latin tranſlation of all his works, by Laurence Surius, and printed three times in Colen, viz. in 1553, 1609, and 1692. His treatiſe on the ſpiritual marriage had been printed before in Latin, at Paris in 1512. John de Schoonhave wrote an apology for this treatiſe, againſt the criticiſm of John Gerſon. He is not the only perſon who wrote an anſwer to this criticiſm. Denis the Carthuſian replied to it alſo (e). It is remarkable that our Ruyſbroeck compoſed with no other aſſiſtance but that of a profound meditation. He uſed to go and hide himſelf in ſome corner of the foreſt; wait there for inſpirations from above (f); and, in proportion as he was favoured with them, wrote them down in his pocket-book. Theſe were the only materials of his works, which he uſed to draw up and digeſt when he returned

(a) Val. Andreas, Bibl. Belg. p. 555.

(b) Dionyſ. Carthuſianus, tract. 2. de Donis Spiritus Sancti, art. 13.

(c) Val. Andr. Bibl. Belg. p. 556, 557.

(d) See the rem. [A].

(e) See Gothofr. Arnoldus, Hiſt. Theolog. Myſticæ, p. 308.

(f) See the rem. [A].

[A] He was an ignorant man, but very devout.] This we are told by Abbot Trithemius; vir, ut ferunt devotus, ſed parum literatus (1). Dennis the Carthuſian obſerves, that though Ruſbrochius was an idiot, he nevertheleſs had ſuch ſublime thoughts, that they raviſhed to admiration, and even almoſt to extaſy, the moſt excellent Profeſſors in Divinity, who own they cannot comprehend them. He aſcribes this to the inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt. Nonne rite mirabile cenſemus, quod Ruſbrochius, cum idiota eſſet, nihilominus merito Sanctitatis & ſimplicitatis ſuæ, tam ſupernaturales divinitus theorias ſortitus eſt, & in ſuo quoque vulgari idiomate tam ſubtiliſſimas veritates conſcripſit, ut excellentiſſimi Sacræ theologiæ profeſſores Spiritum præ admiratione vix habeant, ſeque ſententias ejus non poſſe intelligere ediſſerunt (2). Several other Writers have had recourſe to the ſame cauſe; they affirming that Ruſbrochius received all his knowledge immediately from the Holy Ghoſt; and obſerved, that he himſelf thought ſo. Fundamentum & originem horum ejus ſcriptorum, Lector, qui illuminatis mentis oculis, ſanoque Spirituali guſtu, ad diſcernendum bonum à malo gaudet, facile purum & divinum cognoſcet. Qua cauſa & Editores promiſcue fere Inſcriptionibus Librorum ejus ejuſmodi teſtimonia propoſuerunt. Hos nempe libros divinitate & illuminatione plenos, ac à Deo inſpiratos eſſe. Et in vitæ ejus Hiſtoria narratur. Cap. IIX. p. 4. quod à Gerardo Magno interrogatus, ſic reſponderit; Certum ac firmum habeto, nullum me unquam verbum ſcriptis meis inſeruiſſe, niſi ex inſtinctu Spiritus S. & in ſingulari quadam & dulciſſima præſentia ſuperſanctiſſimæ Trinitatis. Et ſequente capite IX. commemoratur; quod plerumque ſolus in ſylvæ abdita ſe recipere conſueverit, atque ibi ſummo ſilentio, quæ ex Dei Spiritu hauſiſſet, in ſcripta redegerit, hocque pacto omnia ſua opera conſcripſerit, atque ita minime ex aliis congeſſerit. Quippe nulla literarum cultura ornatus, artem hanc neſcivit (3). i. e. " Reader, who- " ſoever has his mental eyes illuminated, and is of a " ſound, ſpiritual taſte, will plainly perceive, that the " foundation and origin of theſe writings is pure and " holy. For this reaſon the Editors of his works " have generally publiſhed the following teſtimonies " concerning

(1) Trithem. apud Geſner. Bibl. folio 452, verſo.

(2) Dionyſ. Carthuſianus, ſerm. 1. de Confeſſ. non Pontif. apud Gothofr. Arnoldum, Hiſtoria Theolog. Myſticæ, p. 307, where he ſays alſo, & hinc Dionyſium illum nuncupavit alterum, ob excellentem ejus ſapientiam, cujus ſolum Spiritum S. habuit Doctorem. Tract. 2. de Donis Spirit. S. art. 13.

(3) Gothofr. Arnoldus, ibid. p. 310.

turned to his Monaſtery. They are greatly eſteemed by ſome perſons, and applauded even by ſome Proteſtants [B]. The character of this myſtical divine may be known from what the reader has ſeen elſewhere, and in what will be ſeen hereunder [C]. Ruyſbroeck's ſubmiſſion to the divine will, extended even to the torments of Hell [D]. He died the ſecond of December 1381, aged fourſcore and eight years. It is related that he performed

" concerning them. Theſe books are filled with divine " illumination, and were inſpired by God. And it is " related in chap. 8. p. 4. of his Life, that he made " the following anſwer to Gerardus Magnus. Be " perfectly aſſured, that I never inſerted a ſingle word " in my writings, without being inſpired by the Holy " Ghoſt; and in a certain ſingular and moſt delightful " preſence of the moſt holy Trinity. And it is ſaid in " the following chapter (the 9th), that he uſed com- " monly to retire alone into the moſt unfrequented " part of the foreſt; and there, in the deepeſt ſilence, " wrote down whatever he had received from the " holy ſpirit; that in this manner he wrote all his " works, and conſequently did not collect them from " others: for as he had not the leaſt tincture of learning, " he was ignorant of that art." What I am going to cite from Valerius Andreas will illuſtrate and confirm all that has been ſaid above. Vir divinæ contemplationi addictiſſimus, & ſanctitatis majoris quam doctrinæ; cum ea, quæ ſcripſit, divino ſpiritu edoctus videatur. Narrat enim Henricus à Pomerio, ejuſdem inſtituti ac loci Religioſus, Vitæque Scriptor, quod antequam libros ſuos dictaret, habuerit pro conſuetudine, ut, dum divinæ illuſtrationis radio immadeſceret, ſolus ſecederet in abdita ſylvæ, ibique dictante Spiritu ſancto ea, quæ ſibi occurrebant, in tabula cerea ſcripto commendans, ſecum ſolebat, ad monaſterium rediens, apportare: ſicque interpolatis vicibus edidiſſe ſuos libros (4). Will any one after this wonder at the complaint many people have made, viz. that Ruyſbroeck's books are very obſcure (5)? How could it be poſſible it ſhould be otherwiſe, as they were writ by an unlearned perſon; and on ſubjects of myſtical divinity, in which nothing is ſcarce underſtood, even when they are treated by the moſt delicate and moſt learned pens?

(4) Val. Andr. Bibl. Belg. p. 555, 556.

(5) Arnold. Hiſt. Theol. Myſticæ, p. 311.

[B] They are greatly eſteemed by ſome perſons, and applauded even by ſome Proteſtants.] Mr. Arnoldus (6) points out ſeveral paſſages of Romiſh Writers, who admired Ruyſbroeck. He does not omit the Lutherans who applaud him; and he alſo ſpeaks of Calviniſts who have judged favourably of them; but he ought not to have ranked among theſe (7) Francis Swertius, who is a zealous Papiſt. Perhaps the circumſtance that miſled him is, his calling to mind that there is a work entitled, Athenæ Batavæ, the Author of which is a Calviniſt; and his not obſerving the difference there is between that book and the Athenæ Belgicæ of Swertius. It is ſcarce poſſible, how careful ſoever an Author may be, not to commit ſuch errors ſometimes.

(6) Ibid. p. 307 & ſeq.

(7) Ibid. p. 309.

[C] The character of this myſtical Divine may be known from what the reader has ſeen elſewhere (8), and in what will be ſeen hereunder.] It is affirmed in the work, whence we borrowed the character of Taulerus, that Ruſbrochius his contemporary, and in ſome meaſure his maſter, is much ſuch a man; and that he ſometimes ſoars higher, and is more methodical (9). It is affirmed two pages after, that Henry Harphius is pretty near ſuch a man as Taulerus. " That before, " and perhaps after him, no man has penetrated, as " he has done, into the depths of the inward ſtate of " a ſoul reſigned to God: in which it is plain Ruſ- " brochius was of great ſervice to him. His charac- " ter is, to propoſe the gradual reſurrection of the " ſtates of the ſpiritual life, in a purified and tried " ſtate. He ſhews in what manner, after various " mortifications, purifications, and trials of the ſoul, " there are raiſed in it, gradually, new ſtates of di- " vine life, firſt active and afterwards paſſive, in the " inferior powers of the ſoul; and after this in the " ſuperior ones (the memory, underſtanding, and " will) afterwards in its eſſence; and laſtly, over its " Being, and the operations of its powers, by the in- " veſtiture which the three perſons of the holy Tri- " nity make of it, and which then manifeſt their " adorable operations. This is the moſt beautiful, " the moſt ſubſtantial, the moſt advanced and deep " ſyſtem of myſtical divinity that ever was ſeen (10)." Mr. Arnoldus (11) quotes Authors who obſerve, that Henry Harphius borrowed from Ruyſbroeck almoſt all the matter of the contemplation in his ſecond and third book. We therefore may form an idea of Ruſbrochius's turn of mind by examining the character of Harphius.

(8) Rem. [E] of the art. TAULERUS.

(9) Lettre touchant les Auteurs Myſtiques, printed with the Theologie Germanique, p. 13. edit. Amſterd. 1700.

(10) Lettre touchant les Auteurs Myſtiques, &c. p. 15.

(11) Arnold. Hiſt. Theol. Myſtic. p. 308.

[D] Ruyſbroeck's ſubmiſſion to the divine will extended even to the torments of Hell.] That is, he thought nothing better than to be ready to ſuffer whatever God might pleaſe to ſend, either death, life, or even the pains of hell. He declared this, as ſome perſons were endeavouring to make him afraid of hell. In Hiſtoria illius, Cap. VIII. legitur. " Quod Gerhardus " cum quandoque inſolitam in Ruſbrochio erga Deum " fiduciam, non ex temeritate, timorem foras mittente, " conceptam perſpexiſſet, quandoque divini judicii & in- " ferni metum ei incutere multis Scripturæ commemoran- " dis ſententiis attentaverit." Sed quanto plus ei quandam injicere formidinem connitebatur, tanto vir plus majori in Deum amore ferveſcebat; & tandem reſpondit: Magiſter Gerharde, fixum & certum habe, me ex animo paratum eſſe ad perferenda omnia, quæ Dominus mihi accidere volet, ſive mors ſit, ſive vita, ſive etiam ipſi intolerabiles cruciatus inferorum. Neque enim quicquam mihi vel jucundius, vel melius, vel ſalubrius judico, nec quicquam aliud vel peto, vel deſidero, quam ut amantiſſimus Dominus Deus meus promptum me ſemper atque paratum inveniat, ad ſuæ arbitrium voluntatis. Hoc breviter totum viri hujus Principium detegit (11). i. e. In chapter 8. of his life, is the following paſſage. " When Gerhard ſometimes ob- " ſerved Ruyſbroek to put an unuſual truſt in, and " have the greateſt love for God, and would there- " fore endeavour to excite in him a fear of God's " judgment and of hell, by mentioning ſeveral " paſſages of Scripture to that purpoſe; the more " Gerhard endeavoured to make him afraid, the " more he ſeemed to be inflamed with the love of " the Almighty, and at laſt anſwered him thus: " Mr. Gerhard, be aſſured, that from the bottom of " my ſoul I am ready to ſuffer any thing that the " Lord ſhall pleaſe to inflict upon me, whether " death, life, or even the dreadful torments of hell. " For I judge that nothing is more pleaſant, or more " to my advantage; nor do I deſire or ſeek any thing " elſe, than that my moſt loving Lord God may al- " ways find me ready and prepared to obey his will. " This ſhews, in few words, the principles of this " man." Mr. Arnoldus, from whom I borrowed all this, had juſt before ſaid, that Ruyſbroeck did not regulate his actions ſo much as the other myſticks do, by the ſervile fear, and the activity which reſults from it, and the unpleaſant exerciſes of the law; but all his ſtudy was the exerciſe of a free evangelical virtue, and the efficacy of the new alliance, manifeſting itſelf by the filial ſpirit that operates in every true believer. Character Myſtici hujus Doctoris (Ruſbrochii) in multis ad Tauleri ſupra excerptum accedere videtur. Attamen judico, Ruſbrochii propoſitionem longè puriorem & vivæ ac fiduciali fidei in nomen Jeſu in nobis conformiorem eſſe. Dum minus, ac omnes ferè alii antiquorum Myſticorum theologorum, timorem ſervilem & inde orientem propriam activitatem, ac legales anxiaſque exercitationes intendat, & è contrario ad liberam Evangelii virtutem & efficaciam Novi Fœderis tantummodo ducat, eo modo, quo hæc ſe per unctionem filialis Spiritus unicuique vere credenti revelat (13).

(12) Idem, ibid. p. 313.

(13) Idem, ibid. p. 312.

I will obſerve by the way, that there are few doctrines, for which the myſticks are more inveighed againſt, than their conſenting to eternal damnation. Mr. Jurieu has not forgot it (4); but he is accuſed of not faithfully quoting the words of Francis de Sales. Conſult Arnoldus (5), who reproaches him pretty warmly on that account, and for ſeveral other faults, and eſpecially for contradicting himſelf (16); but he did not rightly underſtand the following words in page (14) In his Traite Hiſt. ſur la Theol. Myſt. printed at Rotterdam, in 1699.

(15) Arnold. Hiſt. Theolog. Myſt. p. 543 & ſq.

(16) Idem, ibid. p. 537 & ſeq.

performed miracles, and endeavours were uſed to get him canonized [E]. I ſhall point out the errors of Moreri, and thoſe of the Author, Des Eſſais de Literature [F]. I ſhall not explain the ſubject of the diſpute in which Gerſon engaged againſt the book concerning ſpiritual marriage. The reader need but conſult du Pin, who ſays, in a few words, all that is neceſſary to be known on this head (g).

(g) Du Pin, Bibl. Tom. 11. p. 84. Dutch edit.

page 158: Theſe words of Francis de Sales ſhew the weakneſs of the Archbiſhop of Cambray's divinity, which he tranſlates thus: hæc verba monſtrant nobis amentiam Archiepiſcopi Cameracenſis, which ought to have been rendered thus: hæc verba monſtrant nobis locum debilem Theologiæ Archiepiſcopi Cameracenſis. There is a wide difference between the folly of a man, and the weakneſs of his tenets.

[E] It is related that he wrought miracles, and endeavours were uſed to get him canonized.] This appears from the following Latin paſſage. Plura de Vita & Miraculis ſancti hujus viri, poſt Henr. à Pomerio, Marcus Maſtelinus, ejuſdem loci Religioſus, in ſuo Necrologio Viridis Vallis, lib. II. cap. I. & ſeqq. Deſcripſit & acta Vitæ ejuſdem Thomas de Jeſu, Carmelita Excalceatus, Gregorio XV. pro obtinenda illius beatificatione præſentata (17). i. e. "More particulars concerning "the life and miracles of this Saint, after Henricus "a Pom. are related by Marcus Maſtellinus, a "Frier of the ſame houſe, in his Necrologium Viridis Vallis, book II. chap. I. & ſeqq. Thomas de "Jeſu, a barefooted Frier, alſo wrote the particulars "of his life, which he preſented to Pope Gregory "XIV. in order to get him canonized."

(17) Val. Andr. Bibl. Belg. p. 557.

[F] I ſhall point out the errors of Moreri, and thoſe of the Author Des Eſſais de Literature.] I. He ought not to have ſaid, that the Village of Ruiſbroeck is on the Sambre in Brabant. It would be very difficult to find, on the banks of the Sambre, any Village belonging to Brabant; but this would not, in any manner, ſuit with Ruſbrochius's country. It ſtands on the river of Senne, between Bruſſels and Hall. Valerius Andreas and Father Labbe, who were Moreri's Authors in his drawing up this article, declare this expreſsly. How then could he think that a place ſituated between thoſe two cities ſtood on the river Sambre? II. When he ſays that Ruſbrochius was firſt Prieſt and Curate of St. Gudili's Church, he did not attend ſufficiently to the words of the original which he intended to tranſlate, fuit primo Eccleſiæ D. Gudilæ Vicarius & Preſbyter (18). I believe they mean, that he was ſucceſſively Curate and Rector of St. Gudila's Church; for I believe it would be of no uſe to obſerve, that he was a Prieſt, whilſt he was Curate of a Parochial Church. However this be, Moreri has wrongly tranſpoſed Ruſbrochius's two titles; he putting that of Prieſt before that of Curate, in oppoſition to Valerius Andreas whom he copied. III. No ſuch place is known as the Monaſtery of Val-vert, in the neighbourhood of Bruſſels, that which Ruſbrochius was Prior of being called Groendal. Valerius Andreas latinizes it Viridis Vallis; but Moreri ought not to have tranſlated that Latin into French, but have given the name by which that convent always went. Du Pin ſhould not have ſaid, that Ruſbrochius was Prior of the Monaſtery of Canons Regular of Wavre in the Foreſt of Soignies (19); Wavre not ſtanding in this Foreſt, and being a Priory of Benedictins; and after all, Ruſbrochius was Prior of Groendal, not Wavre. The French name of that foreſt is la Foret de Soigne, or de Soignies, and not de Soignien as Moreri has it. V. Dionyſius the Carthuſian is not one of the Latin tranſlators of Ruſbrochius's works. VI. Ruyſbroeck died at eighty eight years of age, and not aged forty eight (20). VII. Inſtead of citing Marcus Maſtellinus in Necro Viridis Vallis, it ſhould have been in Necrologio Viridis Vallis. VIII. He ſhould have quoted book 2. article 13. of Dionyſius the Carthuſian, de Donis Spiritus Sancti, and not book 1. article 3.

(18) Idem, ibid. p. 555.

(19) Du Pin, Bibl. Tom. 11. p. m. 84.

(20) This error is in the Paris edit. of 1699, and not in the preceding ones.

The anonymous Author, who began in 1702 to publiſh at Paris Eſſays de Literature pour la connoiſſance des Livres, wrote the article of Ruſbrochius in the eſſays of November for the ſame year (21). It is ſcarce any thing more than a paraphraſe on Moreri. He has been guilty of the ſix firſt faults I juſt now obſerved, and has added other very groſs ones. I. He ſays that Ruſbrochius's works printed at Colen in 1552, and in 1609, are in 4to; but this is true only of the edition of 1609, the other being in folio. II. He does not know the Colen edition of 1692. III. He ſays it was obſerved that Gerſon was ſo greatly prejudiced againſt this Author, that he could not bear ſo much as to hear him mentioned. Du Pin, on the contrary, affirms, that Gerſon confeſſed afterwards that Ruſbrochius might be excuſed (22). IV. The anonymous Author declares, that there was one John Ruſbach, who was confounded with John Ruyſbroeck. He declares this John Ruſbach to be Author of the following books: Tractatus de præcipuis virtutibus. Liber de fide & judicio. De quatuor tentationibus. De ſettem cuſtodiis. De ſeptem gradibus amoris. De perfectione filiorum Dei. Regnum amantium Deum. De vera contemplatione. Epiſtolæ & cantiones. He affirms that Ruſbroch flouriſhed in the year 1390, as Trithemius obſerves, who alſo confounded him with John Ruſbach: and yet he had ſaid juſt before, that Ruſbrochius was young when he died; that this was in the year 1381, aged forty eight years, contrary to the opinion of Trithemius, who places his death no earlier than the year 1390 (23). He declares that ſeveral Authors have obſerved, that this diſtinction ought to be made between John Ruſbach and John Ruſbroeck. He adds, that he has beſides, for his Author, Conrad Geſner, whoſe hiſtorical library is greatly eſteemed; and who certainly was better acquainted with the Authors of his own country than any other Annaliſt. He has here committed many errors in few words; for, in the firſt place, Geſner's hiſtorical library does not contain any particular concerning John Ruſbach; and ſecondly, Geſner was a Swiſs, and not of the ſame country with John Ruyſbroeck; and our Author does not ſay any thing of the native country of his pretended John Ruſbach. Will he have him to be a Swiſs; and that this conſequence may be inferred from what he has ſaid of Geſner? But in this caſe it alſo muſt be concluded that Ruyſbroeck was a Swiſs. Thirdly, He confounds, with Geſner, thoſe who abridged his Bibliotheque, and added new articles to it. It is they who ſpeak, not only of Joannes Ruſbachius, but alſo of Joannes Ruſberus, as of two Authors different from Joannes Ruſbrochius. They are groſsly miſtaken, and ſplit one Author into two, as Father Labbe conjectures very well (24). The books they aſcribed to this John Ruſbachius, and which, they ſay, were printed at Colen in 1552, apud hæredes Quenteli, are in the edition of John Ruſbroch's works, printed in Colen in 1552, by the ſame printers. With regard to the book which they aſcribe to John Ruſberus, De ornatu ſpiritualium nuptiarum Libri 3. it is certainly a work of our Ruyſbroeck (25); and the Author of the Eſſais is himſelf of this opinion (26).

(21) p. 132 & ſeq.

(22) Du Pin, Bibl. Tom. 11. p. m. 84.

(23) It is under this year that Trithemius places the flouriſhing ſtate, and not the death of Rusbrochius.

(24) Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. 1. p. 604.

(25) See Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. p. 556.

(26) Eſſais de Literature, Nov. 1702. p. 136.

RYER (ANDREW), Sieur de Malezair, Gentleman in ordinary of the King's Bed-Chamber, and Knight of the Holy Sepulchre, lived in the 17th Century. He reſided a conſiderable time at Conſtantinople for his Majeſty's ſervice, and afterwards was Conſul for the French Nation in Egypt. He attained to a conſiderable ſkill in the Turkiſh and Arabic languages, as appears by his writings [A]. He was born in Marcigni (a), a ſmall town ſtanding on the Loire, on the Frontiers of Forez (b).

(a) Marciniacenſis. See Colomeſius, Gallia Orient. p. 163.

(b) See Baudrand, voce Marciniacum.

I muſt

[A] He attained to a conſiderable ſkill in the Turkiſh and Arabick languages, as appears by his writings.] He publiſhed a Turkiſh grammar at Paris in 1630; and four years after publiſhed, in that city, a French verſion

I must not omit that ſome criticks have cenſured his tranſlation of the Korân [B].

ſion of Guliſtan, or the Empire of the Roſes, written by Sâdi, Prince of the Turkiſh and Perſian Poets. His principal work is a French tranſlation of the Korân, which has born ſeveral impreſſions. He publiſhed it after he had been Conſul of the French nation in Egypt, as appears from the advantageous teſtimonial, with which the Conſuls of Marſeilles favoured him, dated the 12th of February 1633, and annexed to the verſion in queſtion.

[B] Some criticks have cenſured his tranſlation of the Korân.] The learned Windet accuſes him of taking too great a liberty in tranſpoſing, adding and ſuppreſſing ſeveral things. Hunc locum male reddidit Gallus interpres Sieur du Ryer; & ſolet nimium licenter intervertere, addere, ac demere. Verſio autem Anglica, ex Gallica ejus facta, itidem male habet (1). The Engliſh verſion, made from du Ryer's, has the ſame defects.

(1) Ja. Windet, de functorum ſtatu, ſect. 9. p. 223. edit. Lond. 1677.

RYER (PETER), a Pariſian, ſucceeded Faret in the French Academy, the 21ſt of November 1664 (a). He tranſlated a vaſt number of books into French, and wrote ſome plays (b). Moſt of his verſions are from the Greek or Roman Authors. With regard to the Greeks, he only put into modern French the old French tranſlations (c); or, at moſt, has followed the Latin verſions; and, with reſpect to the ancient Latin Authors, he often miſunderſtood their meaning; as he ſometimes did in his tranſlation of the Moderns [A], I mean Thuanus and Strada. It is thought that his verſions would have been done with more ſpirit and accuracy, had the bookſellers been a little more generous to him [B]; but as they paid but a ſmall price for every ſheet, he was forced to whip

(a) Peliſſon, Hiſt. de l'Academie Franc. p. m. 229.

(b) See the liſt of theſe in l'Hiſt. de l'Acad. p. 356, 357; and in Baillet's Jugemens ſur les Poetes, num. 1486.

(c) See Baillet, Jugem. des Sav. num. 949, which refers us to Parnaſſe Reformé, p. m. 26 & ſeq.

[A] He often miſunderſtood the meaning of the ancient Authors, as he ſometimes did in the tranſlation of the moderns.] (1) The leaſt imperfect of his tranſlations, in the judgment of many, is that of Cicero's works, though he omitted ſeveral paſſages which he did not underſtand, particularly in the orations; though in order to come off, and fill up the chaſms, he ſubſtituted in the room of them ſeveral inſignificant and nonſenſical things, that are fit only to dazle and puzzle young perſons (2). He is leveled at, if I miſtake not, in the following paſſage of l'Hexameron ruſtique. "He who tranſlated, into French, "Tully's beautiful work de amicitia, has not been "more lucky in his tranſlation of the following "words, Agrigentinum doctum quendam virum, "which he tranſlates as follows: A learned man "named Agrigentinus, without perceiving that Tully "ſpeaks of Empedocles Agrigentinus, whom he de"notes by the name of his native place Agrigentum or "Agragas, a city of Sicily. Beſides, there is no "learned man whoſe proper name is Agrigentinus. "The ſame Writer, in his verſion of Valerius Max"imus, in the very firſt chapter, example 4. p. 6. "tranſlates vitio tabernaculum captum, in this manner, "the tabernacle had been touched by chance; inſtead "of, They had been wanting in the ceremonies that "ought to be obſerved, when they take the place of the "Augurs called Tabernaculum. By his not underſtand"ing theſe words, tabernaculum captum, according to "the ſenſe in which they ſhould have been taken in "that place, and by not knowing the cuſtom of the "Augurs, he imagined this ought to be expounded "according to the cuſtom of the Jews, among whom, "none but the Levites were allowed to come near "the tabernacle (3)." To this I will add a paſſage from the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (4). "Teiſſier took notice of ſome errors in du Ryer's "tranſlation, and among others the following. Thu"anus, ſpeaking of John Rivius, who died in 1553, "ſaid annos cum ſeculo numerabat, which ſignifies "that Rivius died at 53 years of age; whereas du "Ryer ſays, he died at an hundred years of age. If he "has committed ſuch faults, in tranſlating a mo"dern Author, whoſe ſenſe, though ever ſo elegant, "may be more eaſily diſcovered than that of the an"cients, we may ſuppoſe that he has made ſome "miſtakes in tranſlating Cicero. And indeed we "ſee, in Leſcalopier the Jeſuit's Commentaries on "Cicero de natura Deorum, continual complaints of "poor du Ryer's verſion (5)." I obſerved another fault, which Teiſſier has taken notice of, relating to the following words of Thuanus: Hulrico Huteno equiti Franco . . . . quadamtenus comparandus (6), which du Ryer tranſlates thus: He may be compared, in ſome meaſure, to Ulric Hutten, a French Knight, which Teiſſier criticizes thus: Hutten was a German, born in Franconia; and not a Frenchman, as du Ryer ſays, who did not underſtand the ſignification of the Latin word Francus (7). Teiſſier overlooked the like blunder in the article of Duaren. Eaque (Duareni Opera) Cujacius ipſe plurimi ſemper fecit, cum ex quatuor Franciſcis qui eadem ætate eandem ſcientiam profitebantur, unum Duarenum ſibi placere, cæteros jus tantum deligurire diceret (8). Du Ryer tranſlated this paſſage of Thuanus in manner following: Cujas himſelf highly eſteemed Duaren's works; and ſaid, that among the four French Profeſſors, who taught the ſame ſcience at the ſame time, Duaren only pleaſed him, &c. What a miſtake is this! To ſuppoſe that Franciſcus is the name of a nation, and not a Chriſtian name. Thuanus's meaning is this. There lived at the ſame time, four Profeſſors of Civil Law, all whoſe Chriſtian names were Francis; and, of theſe four, Duaren was the only perſon whom Cujas eſteemed. The three others were Francis Baudoin, Francis Hotman, and Francis Roaldes. I met with ſeveral more errors in the tranſlation of Thuanus. To all theſe I will add the blunder obſerved by Colomeſius, whoſe words are as follow (9). "Mr. "du Ryer . . . has done great ſervice to devout per"ſons, in tranſlating theſe pſalms (10) into our lan"guage with ſo much elegance. There is only one "place, where I wiſh he had been a little more at"tentive to the Latin; I mean in page 17 & ſeq. of "the ſecond edition, where du Ryer's tranſlation "runs thus; and, as if I was ſtill a child at a hun"dred years of age, broke and diſabled as I am, I ſtill "perform the actions of a child. But he ought to "have tranſlated it in manner following, and as "though I was an hundred of age, I do, in the age at "which I am arrived, all the actions of a child. If "theſe pſalms were writ by Antonio King of Portu"gal, du Ryer's error is inexcuſable; it being cer"tain that this unhappy Prince was not ſixty four "when he died."

(1) Baillet, Jugemens des Sav. num. 549.

(2) He adds, that Father l'Eſcalopier often complains of the errors he commits through every part of his Tully.

(3) Hexameron ruſtique, p. 27, 28.

(4) Nouv. de la Republ. des Lettres, October 1684. art. 2. p. 774, in the Elogiums extracted from Thuanus, publiſhed with notes by Teiſſier.

(5) It is to be obſerved, that l'Eſcalopier cenſures only the verſion of de Natura Deorum.

(6) Thuan. lib. 13. p. 271. ad ann. 1524.

(7) Teiſſier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. 1. p. 91.

(8) Thuan. lib. 23. p. 471. ad ann. 1559.

(9) Colomies, Bibl. Choiſie, p. 145.

(10) That is, Pſalmi confeſſionales inventi in ſcrinio Antonii Portugalliæ Regis, Lutetiæ 1595, 16.

[B] It is thought that his verſions would have been done with more ſpirit and accuracy, had the Bookſellers been a little more generous to him.] After the paſſage I quoted above from the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, are the following words (11). "This ought to be "a leſſon to ſeveral petty Authors, who know only a "little Latin they brought from the college, not to "venture to tranſlate. This is a taſk that requires "greater abilities than is commonly imagined, and "requires perſons who do not labour for bread. I "obſerve this without hinting in any manner at the "following paſſage of Richelet's Dictionary, page "110, part 2 (12). The late du Rier wrote for bread, "that is, wrote merely to ſupport himſelf." Baillet furniſhes us with two paſſages. And indeed it has been thought, that his learning, and his ſkill in languages, was not of a great extent; and that being hired by the Bookſellers, who maintained him, they did not allow him time enough to poliſh and complete his writings (13). This is the firſt paſſage, but the other is ſtill more entertaining. "(14) Such kind of Writers, who are re"ſolved never to go back, or who by choice, or "their bad circumſtances, are always obliged to go "forward, whatever obſtacle they may meet with, "would imagine themſelves maimed, ſhould they ſup-

(11) Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres, Octob. 1684. art. 2. p. 775.

(12) This is according to the Geneva edit. of 1680; but as many of my Readers may have other editions, I ſhall obſerve that it is under the word Pain (Bread).

(13) Baillet, Jugemens, num. 949.

(14) Idem, ibid. Tom. 1. p. 445, 446.

whip and ſpur to ſupport his family. He died in 1656 (d). A particular is related concerning him in the Menagiana [C], which I ſhall give in the remark.

(d) And not in 1658, as Moreri ſays. S. Remuald, Journal Chronologique, Tom. 2. p. 570, fixes his death, not to the 6th of Novemb. 1658 (as Moreri) but to the 21ſt.

" preſs any thing. And thoſe particularly, whoſe " ſubſiſtence depends on the weight and meaſure of " their writings, would imagine they ſhould loſe a " penny, in eraſing an uſeleſs or improper word. " This was the reaſon why William Xylander, Ludo- " vico Dolce, John Baudoin, Peter du Ryer, and ſe- " veral other hireling Writers, who are in the Book- " ſellers pay, are obliged to lengthen out and en- " large, as much as poſſible, all the writings they " put to preſs. By this means, to keep themſelves " alive, they ſubmitted to ſully their reputation, " ſome by the neceſſity they were under of tranſlating " at the rate of 30 French ſols, or a crown a ſheet: " others of writing verſes at four livres a hundred " when long ones, and forty pence, when they were " ſhort, as we are told by Furetiere *." Peruſe what I have ſaid of Cardan (15).

* Nouvell. Allegor. p. 161. des Troubles du R. d'Eloq.

(15) Rem. [T] of his article.

[C] A particular is related of him in the Menagiana.] " I believe Mr. du Ryer was a native of Paris. He " was like Xylander, qui fami magis quam famæ inſer- " viebat, i. e. " one who ſought to fill his belly, ra- " ther than gain fame." He tranſlated for money, " and died before he had finiſhed his tranſlation of " Thuanus. To ſave expence, he lived out of Paris, " beyond the Piquepuces, where he reſided with his " wife and children. I went once to ſee him with " ſome company, on which occaſion he treated us " with ſome cherries he gathered in a little garden " belonging to him. He wrote a tragedy, entitled, " Alcyonée, which is an admirable piece, and equal " in all reſpects to thoſe of Corneille. There are " ſome wonderful verſes in it, and it is finely con- " ducted. Mondory acted his part in it very well " (16)."

(16) Menagiana, p. 366. 1ſt edit. Dutch.

Vigneul Marville, page 196. Tom. 1. of his Melanges, ſpeaks of a viſit which himſelf and ſome others paid du Ryer; and ſays that the entertainment he gave them, conſiſting of milk, cherries, water, and brown bread, made them bewail the fate of ſo excellent a man.

The End of the Eighth Volume.